PHIL-210-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Logical Thought

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course cultivates sound reasoning. Students will learn to see the structure of claims and arguments and to use those structures in developing strong arguments and exposing shoddy ones. We will learn to evaluate arguments on the strength of the reasoning rather than on the force of their associations and buzzwords.

Instructors: L. Bowie

Expected enrollment: 75

PHIL-220-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Introduction to the Philosophy of Science

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Scientific theories come and go--what was once believed true is often later thought false. What then is the status of current scientific theories? What makes a theory "good"? How do we know whether accepting a theory is based on scientific reasoning--rather than scientific or nonscientific rationales? In what ways does science in practice depart from scientific ideals? This course will explore answers to these questions proposed by scientists and philosophers of science. We will study some historical views, but will focus on scholars writing in the 1960s through the present.

Instructors: S. Hawthorne

PHIL-225-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Spring) Symbolic Logic

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course develops a symbolic system that can be used as the basis for inference in all fields. It will provide syntax and semantics for the language of this system and investigate its adequacy. It provides the basis for all further work in logic or in the philosophical foundations of mathematics. Much of the course has a mathematical flavor, but no knowledge of mathematics is necessary.

Instructors: L. Bowie

Expected enrollment: 75

PHIL-226-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Religion 226-01, Critical Social Thought 250f-01)

This course begins its survey of the discipline of the philosophy of religion with the work of Augustine. We then proceed to an examination of the classical theistic arguments for knowledge of God's existence (those of Anselm, Aquinas, and Maimonides) that dominated Scholastic thought and consider the criticisms of these approaches by Enlightenment philosophers such as Kant. We trace the rise of experience as the central category of pietism and romanticism in Schleiermacher's Speeches. Finally, we focus on the idealistic and pragmatic tradition in American philosophy of religion.

(Fall) Ethical Issues in Complex Organizations - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Complex Organizations 232)

There is much talk recently of the need for increased attention to "ethics" in organizational life. This course examines the basis for this concern and the underlying beliefs and structures that give rise to ethical issues, with the goal of helping students to clarify their own positions. Topics addressed will include profit, governance, consumption, distribution, and the social contract. Readings will draw on philosophy, religion, economics, history, literature, management theory, and current events

Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr

Instructors: The department

PHIL-235-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Medical Ethics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Modern medicine has raised new and difficult moral and philosophical problems. Topics discussed include: What is the distinction between health and illness? How should limited health care resources be distributed? How are medical problems related to larger social problems (e.g., gender inequality)? What are the responsibilities of medical researchers toward their research subjects? What moral reasons do we have to be concerned about the growth of technology in medicine? Are the basic institutions of medicine and medical education just?

PHIL-240-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012(Spring) Environmental Ethics: Nature/Culture/Values - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Community-based learning course)

A fundamental problem we face as humans is how we should relate to the natural world. Why not turn Yosemite into a parking lot? Should we control nature by applying scientific and technological expertise? Or should we strive for noninterference and preservation of the wild? How do we balance the pressing needs of people for food, energy, and other resources with the needs of other species or whole ecosystems? Students will explore these questions and issues in the classroom and in community-based learning or other experiential projects that put ideas into action.

Instructors: S. Hawthorne

Expected enrollment: 50

PHIL-241-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012(Spring) Issues in Contemporary Moral Theory - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Do we need to develop virtues to lead a good life? Is morality founded on freedom or happiness? What does it involve for an individual to be just? What is the relationship between morality and power? This course explores questions and texts relevant to contemporary ethical philosophy. We will read a mix of contemporary and historical texts examining some of these questions in detail.

Prerequisites: Philosophy 205 or permission of instructor

Instructors: J. Harold

Expected enrollment: 30

PHIL-242-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012(Spring) Social and Political Philosophy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

An examination of a variety of topics in social and political philosophy, drawing from historical as well as contemporary sources. We will examine questions such as the following: What is the nature and scope of political authority? Do citizens have a duty to obey the laws of their state? What duties do we have to oppressed and marginalized groups? How do race, class, gender, and sexual orientation matter to political freedom and authority? How should we balance political liberties against the public good? Attention will be given to the application of these questions to particular contemporary social and political issues.

Instructors: J. Delston

PHIL-248-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012(Spring) Philosophical Issues in Race and Racism - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

An introduction to discussions of "race" within philosophy and related discussions in science, the law, and the arts. Topics to be discussed include: Is "race" real, subjective, or produced by society? How is race relevant to our identities? How does the popular media represent "race?" Does science construct "race?" What is the connection between "race," gender, and class? Readings from philosophy and a variety of interdisciplinary texts, including film and literature.

PHIL-249-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012(Fall) Women and Philosophy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Gender Studies 210)

Women have to a great extent been denied a place in the canon of Western philosophy. But voices of historical women philosophers are being recovered, and increasingly women contribute to current literature and teaching. In the first half of the course, we'll read selections from historical literature—the ancient Greeks through the American pragmatists. In the second half, we'll examine recent feminist literature, tracing themes that have been important over the centuries. We'll also ask questions about the role of women in philosophy, such as: Is their contribution distinctive? Is reason gendered? When is philosophy feminist?

PHIL-252-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Philosophical Foundations of Western Thought: The Nineteenth Century

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course explores the ways the nature, possibility, and extent of human freedom were conceptualized by German philosophers in the nineteenth century. Readings are drawn from the work of Hegel, Feuerbach, Marx, and Nietzsche. Specific topics include Hegel's metaphysics of spirit, Feuerbach's critique of religious and philosophical mystification, Marx's analysis of alienation, and Nietzsche's ideal of the "Over-Man."

PHIL-255-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Existentialism - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Is life absurd? Do human beings really want to be free? Or do we prefer to sacrifice our freedom for comfort and amusement? Is God dead? Is it possible to live without religious belief? These are among the central questions about human life raised by existential thinkers. We will discuss these issues, and many others, through careful reading of philosophic and literary texts by such important existentialists as Søren Kierkegaard, Friedrich Nietzsche, Martin Heidegger, Jean-Paul Sartre, Albert Camus, Simone de Beauvoir, and Franz Fanon.

(Fall) Philosophy of Mind

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course explores long-standing questions about the nature of consciousness; the relationship between mind and body; the relationship between mind and language; and the role that science has (if any) in negotiating these questions. The course will emphasize the philosophical understanding and implications of current work in neuroscience.

PHIL-271-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Philosophy of Language - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

In the twentieth century, problems in the philosophy of language have become central to nearly all philosophical concerns. This course addresses key questions: What is truth? What is it for a sentence to have a meaning? Does language determine the way we think? Readings are drawn from Frege, Russell, Wittgenstein, Whorf, Quine, Chomsky, Frye, and others.

(Spring) Philosophy of the Arts - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Can a pile of bricks be art? What is the difference between a musical work and a bunch of random noise? What makes a Marx Brothers movie funny? Othello a tragedy? Should art appeal to the masses?

Instructors: T. Wartenberg

PHIL-275-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Spring) Philosophy and Film Theory - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Film Studies 290s)

An exploration of philosophical issues encountered in the study of film. Why do we need a theory of film? What is a film anyway? Do films have "authors"? How do films engage our emotions? Can films be socially critical? What can we learn from films? These are examples of the topics to be discussed in this course as we investigate the nature of film and its relation to philosophy. There will be weekly required film screenings.

Prerequisites: 4 credits in department or in film studies, or permission of instructor

Notes: 2 meetings (75 minutes), 1 screening (1.5 hours)

Instructors: T. Wartenberg

PHIL-280-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Philosophy for Children

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement
(Community-based learning course; Speaking-intensive)

When you act bravely, can you be scared? How do you know that you are not dreaming now? If everyone told you you weren't a person, would you believe them? These questions are raised by children's books, such as Frog and Toad Together and The Bear That Wasn't. In this course, you will learn how to conduct discussions of philosophical questions like these among elementary school children using picture books. The first half of the course will concentrate on developing the necessary skills; the second on teaching philosophy to the children. Along the way, we'll delve into a range of philosophical issues, as we prepare to teach an introductory philosophy course for second graders.

(Spring) Seminar in Philosophy of Language

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

How do words come to mean things? Frege introduced two aspects of meaning: reference, that is, whatever expressions pick out in the world, and sense, a publicly accessible means by which expressions pick out their references, which must be grasped by all speakers. This course is an extended examination of the concept of sense, the uses to which it has been put, and the criticisms that have been lodged against it. We'll look at Frege's work, the complaints made by Quine and Kripke, Davidson's theory of meaning, and Dummett's defense of sense.

(Fall) Advanced Logic

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Mathematics 327f)

This course presents a careful development of predicate calculus, formal elementary number theory, and elementary recursion theory, culminating in a proof of Gödel's incompleteness results. It includes some discussion of the philosophical significance of these results for the foundations of mathematics.

Prerequisites: Philosophy 225, 4 credits in philosophy or mathematics, or permission of instructor

Instructors: L. Bowie

PHIL-328-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Spring) Non-Classical Logic - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course looks at the recent flowering of non-classical logics. The most prominent are modal logics concerning necessity and possibility, which have come to dominate work in metaphysics and epistemology. Conditional logics, intuitionist logics, and relevance logics have also become important. These logics are particularly useful in graduate-level classes in philosophy but also are interesting in their own right.

Prerequisites: Philosophy 225 and 4 credits in philosophy or in mathematics

Instructors: S. Mitchell

PHIL-334-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Fall) Topics in Ethics: International Justice: Possibilities and Limits

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

In an increasingly globalized world, ethical questions take on international scope. Poverty contributes to one third of human deaths annually, raising questions about equality, distributive justice, and human rights across national boundaries. The moral evaluation of global institutions, the ethical use of coercive practices, and the moral status of groups and states take on more force. What are our obligations to international justice? How do national citizenship and membership in other groups shape or contribute to these obligations? In this course, we will focus on practical and theoretical issues of global justice.

(Spring) Topics in Philosophy: Pragmatism

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

American Pragmatism, prominent in the early twentieth century, is undergoing a resurgence. Pragmatists do not sharply separate theory and practice, instead bringing philosophical thinking to social engagement. Their distinctive theories of truth, and their pluralism and fallibilism, continue to be influential. We will explore writings of the original pragmatists, including Peirce, James, Dewey, and Addams; neo-pragmatist feminists and philosophers of science; and their critics.

PHIL-350-02 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Spring) Topics in Philosophy: Pain

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Pain is so common that it is tempting to think we know exactly what it is. Theorizing is complicated, however, by our loose usage of the word "pain" and by fascinatingly bizarre pain experiences. In this course, we will critically consider the leading modern theories and the arguments for them offered by philosophers and pain scientists. We'll attempt to arrive at our own answer to the deceptively simple question: What is pain? The course concludes with a focus on the ethical implications of our new understandings. Do animals or fetuses feel pain? Is ending life ever justified to relieve it? More basically: If pain is a variable, complex experience can it support any ethical claims?

Prerequisites: 8 credits in Philosophy; students with 4 credits in Philosophy and 4 credits in Neuroscience or Psychology should contact the instructor for permission to register.

(Fall) Systematic Study of One Philosopher: Kant - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Immanuel Kant's Critique of Pure Reason is one of the few works in the Western philosophic tradition that fundamentally transformed our understanding of the place of human beings in the world. This seminar involves a careful, critical reading of the text in order to assess the nature and significance of the epistemological and metaphysical views it expounds.

(Spring) Systematic Study of One Philosopher: Aristotle - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course will look closely at Aristotle's moral and aesthetic thought through a careful examination of his Nicomachean Ethics and his Poetics. In these works Aristotle gives us his conception of a well-lived life, as well as his view about the relationship between emotions and reason. In addition to the primary texts, we'll read some contemporary commentary on Aristotle, and we'll look at the influence of Aristotle's ideas on contemporary philosophical debates about art and life. This course presupposes prior study of ancient Greek philosophy. Prior coursework in ethics or aesthetics is also recommended.

(Fall) Philosophy of Art: Arthur Danto - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This class examines philosophical issues concerning the interpretation, creation, and experience of art. Topics vary from year to year.

This seminar will focus on the work of Arthur Danto, perhaps the preeminent contemporary philosopher of art and art critic for The Nation. We will explore his writings from his seminal essay, "The Artworld," to his recent book, The Abuse of Beauty, in an attempt to understand his views on art, its development, and its future.

(Spring) The Philosophy of Art: The Shock of the New - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Art Studio 280s-01)

Preamble (for topics courses): This class examines philosophical issues concerning the interpretation, creation, and experience of art. Topics vary from year to year.

Innovative works of art shock the world and are difficult for viewers to interpret in light of previous artistic practice. How, then, can viewers and critics understand new and challenging works of art? This is the topic that we will investigate in this course by looking at art, reading about art, making art, and writing about art.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department

Notes: students enrolled in this course will be responsible for some of the cost of materials in addition to the standard studio fee of $60.

Instructors: T. Wartenberg, R. Hachiyana

PHIL-375-01 - Philosophy - 2011-2012

(Spring) Philosophy of Film - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Film Studies 390-02)

Preamble (for topics courses): An examination of different theoretical issues concerning the nature of film and film viewing. Topics vary yearly.

Recently, philosophers have argued that films resemble philosophy in their use of thought experiments. But the role of thought experiments in philosophy is itself contested. The seminar will investigate how thought experiments are used in science and philosophy in order to determine whether films and, more generally, art can legitimately claim that their presentation of thought experiments connects them to philosophy. Some previous acquaintance with philosophy highly recommended.

(Spring) Bon Odori (Japanese Spiritual Dance)

Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course focuses on a Japanese Buddhist folk dance performed outdoors and danced in a concentric circle around a raised platform. It is celebrated as a reminder of the gratefulness one should feel toward one's ancestors. From this dance of joy comes Bon Odori, a time in which ancestors and their sacrifices are remembered and appreciated. Through studying the dance, students will understand its intentions: remembering and appreciating who you are and where you come from. Because the dance is closely related to Buddhism, this course will provide an opportunity for the students both to exercise through dancing and to calm their minds.

(Fall) Advanced Dressage and Jumping

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Preamble (for topics courses): Riding Fee $560

This course ties the concepts of straightness, rhythm, obedience and suppleness to technique over fences. Focuses on riders' effectiveness and position in both disciplines. Riders should be comfortable riding a green or unknown horse over a course of 3'3" jumps and capable of riding a 1st level dressage test on an unknown horse. Two spots will be reserved for riders without their own horse.

Prerequisites: Permission of Instructor. 1 meeting, 1-1/2hours . Fee course.

(Spring) Women in Sport

(Gender Studies 216)

This course is designed to introduce students to the history of women in sport, the status of women in sport since the passage of Title IX in 1972, and current issues impacting women in sport such as race, gender, and sexual orientation. Students will explore the influence of sport on the lives of women and how selected women sport leaders have influenced the growth and development of sport.

(Spring) Introduction to Sport Pedagogy - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course is designed to introduce students to sport pedagogy with a focus on coaching youth sports. Topics include coaching philosophy, motor learning, sport physiology, sport biomechanics, sport psychology, and risk management/liability. We will consider the benefits of playing sports, the development of age appropriate instruction and training programs, goal setting, effective feedback, and the importance of coaches as role models for children.

Physics

PHYS-103-01 - Physics - 2011-2012

(Fall) Foundations of Physics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course studies a variety of topics in physics unified by the physical notions of force, energy, and equilibrium. Mathematics is used at the level of geometry, proportion, and dimensional analysis. Topics, drawn from the MCAT syllabus, include geometrical optics, time, oscillation, statics, elasticity, conservation of energy, and fluids.

(Spring) Renewable Energy

(Environmental Studies 104)

We will examine the feasibility of converting the entire energy infrastructure of the US from one that is dependent on fossil fuels to one that utilizes mostly renewable sources of energy. We will examine the potential scale of energy production and the associated costs, natural resource requirements and land usage needs for both renewables, such as solar, wind and biofuel, and non-renewables, such as coal, natural gas, petroleum and nuclear. By applying extensive use of basic algebra and an elementary understanding of the physical processes underpinning each energy technology, we will arrive at a number of urgent conclusions about the challenges facing our energy infrastructure.

(Fall) Science in the Media

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

First-year seminar

Popular coverage of science ranges in depth and accuracy, and many scientists do not see the importance of communicating their work, or their excitement, to the general public. Scientific breakthroughs contribute to everyone's quality of life, but the process is poorly understood by many, leading to misunderstandings and misgivings that can affect public policy. This course will look at newsworthy results from current scientific research, exploring topics to better understand the science, ideas such as scientific consensus and repeatability, and examining the tension that may exist between the scientists and the public. Topics will be pulled largely from the physical sciences.

(Spring) Gender in Science

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Gender Studies 241)

This course examines explanations for the underrepresentation of women in science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM) with an eye to identifying how to increase the participation of women in science. The course will address questions about gender differences in cognition and ability, the role of stereotyping, as well as the "leaky pipeline" issue, that is, the rate and timing of the departure of women from scientific fields. Course readings will explore the psychology of gender, as it relates to STEM. In addition, we will read research from physical scientists, reports from professional organizations such as the American Physical Society, and reports from congressional committees.

(Spring) Comparative Biomechanics - *Not offered this year/term

(Biological Sciences 322)

The main objective of this course is to explore organismal structure and function via an examination of the basic physical principles that guide how living things are constructed and how organisms interact with their environment. We will use the combined approaches of the biologist and engineer to study the impact of size on biological systems, address the implications of solid and fluid mechanics for animal design, survey different modes of animal locomotion, and learn how biologists working in diverse areas (e.g., ecology, development, evolution, and physiology) gain insight through biomechanical analyses.

PHYS-324-01 - Physics - 2011-2012

(Spring) Methods of Applied Mathematics - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Mathematics 324s)

This course is an introduction to theories and techniques important to applied mathematics. Topics include special functions, calculus of variations, theory of functions of a complex variable, solution of partial differential equations, integral transform methods, and Green's functions. While the focus of the course is on analytical techniques, we will develop numerical approaches to problem solving.

(Spring) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Family Ties - *Not offered this year/term

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

In this course, students will engage a number of classic works of literature and moral philosophy, as well as contemporary works, in order to reflect on the ways the family shapes private and public life and is, in return, shaped by them. We will cover such questions as: how does the family create and then influence the individual? What does it mean to be part of a family? What do individuals owe their families and are those obligations fair? How do we form families? Can the family insulate individuals from politics and society--in good ways and bad? Is political order like familial order? Are the state and society a threat or support for the family? How have these understandings changed over time?

(Fall) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Black Metropolis

First-year seminar

Black Metropolis referred to the more than half a million black people jammed into a South Side ghetto in Chicago at mid-twentieth century that featured an entrenched black political machine, a prosperous black middle class, and a thriving black cultural scene in the midst of massive poverty and systemic inequality. This course will follow the political, economic, and cultural developments of what scholars considered to be the typical urban community in postwar United States. We will examine such topics as Martin Luther King's failed desegregation campaign; Harold Washington, first black mayor; William Julius Wilson's urban underclass thesis; and the rise of Barack Obama.

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

What is the relationship of truth to our political life? Does democracy require truth? Or can democracy pervert truth? Can truth thrive in any type of government? Are these issues more or less relevant for contemporary politics? This course is an introduction to political theory through an examination of these questions. During the semester, students will examine a variety of political theory classics, analyzing the authors' perspectives on these questions.

(Fall) Comparative Politics

(Writing-intensive)

This course provides an introduction to comparative political analysis. The primary objective of the class is to help students understand how the modern world, one characterized by the rise of industrialized nation-states, took form and what shape it might take in the post-Cold War era. We will examine how the challenges of economic development, social transformation, and nation-building sparked the emergence of alternative roads to modernity characterized by diverse configurations of political institutions and social forces. We will also assess how globalization and the re-emergence of local identities may be redefining our understanding of modernity.

(Spring) Politics of Minority Rights

This course examines the politics surrounding minority rights in the US since World War II, with special emphasis on the politics of race, class, gender, sexuality, and citizenship/immigration. Our aim will be to trace the accomplishments and limitations of the American state in offering full democratic inclusion to all members of the polity. Through readings, lectures, discussions, and film screenings, we will analyze several public debates related to contemporary minority inclusion. In the process, we will evaluate such behemoths of minority politics as affirmative action, same-sex marriage, and the Americans with Disabilities Act (1990).

(Spring) Ancient and Medieval Political Thought - *Not offered this year/term

Through the works of the ancient tragedians and comedians, Thucydides, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Seneca, Augustine, Aquinas, and Pizan, this course explores themes in ancient and medieval political thought. In alternating years, the course will be taught as either a survey of a wide array of authors or as a more thematically focused study of just a few writers. In either format, we will pay particular attention to the ways these writers characterized the relationship between the individual and community; the roles knowledge, reason, emotion, and rhetoric play in political life; the link between gender and citizenship; and the various forms political community can take.

(Taught in English; RES 242s)

Following the collapse of the USSR and the Gulf War, Central Asia and the Caucasus became new centers of geopolitical rivalry. The new states are a source of energy (oil and gas) for Western powers and a vital transit corridor between Eastern Europe and China. While a new "Great Game" is being fought between Western, Far Eastern, and Middle Eastern powers for control over energy pipelines, the region is threatened by environmental catastrophe and water shortages. Is the new oil industry a source of prosperity or an instrument for exploitation, corruption, and instability? How important are the new states to the West's strategic energy interests?

(Fall) The Politics of Abortion in the Americas

(Gender Studies 250f(01))

The Americas have been characterized by the strictness of their laws in the criminalization of abortion. In some countries abortion is criminalized even when the woman's life is at risk. What role have women's movements played in advancing abortion rights? What has mattered most for a movement's success, its internal characteristics or external forces? Has the way the movement framed its demands mattered? How has the political influence of the Catholic and Evangelical churches influenced policies in this area? We will answer these questions by exploring examples from across the region through primary and secondary sources.

(Spring) Feminism and Capitalism

(Writing-intensive; Gender Studies 270)

This course will explore the relationship between feminism and capitalism in a contemporary context, particularly the ways in which they reinforce and contradict each other. Examining this question through Marxist, liberal, post-structuralist, and post-colonial feminist theory, and the recent history of feminist and anti-capitalist movements, we will consider the economic and political underpinnings of feminist thinking and practice. Do certain feminisms carry implicit anti-capitalist commitments? To what extent are particular feminisms, especially liberal feminism, reliant upon capitalist structures and processes? What stakes might feminists have in preserving or uprooting capitalism?

(Spring) Religion and Democracy

Across the globe, religion appears to be steadily inserting itself into politics. In this course, we will examine themes such as liberalism, the separation of church and state, democracy, the burgeoning of the New Christian Right in the United States, Islam's relationship with liberalism, and the growth of Hindu Nationalism in South Asia. The purpose of the course is to investigate some of the tensions that exist between liberal-democratic practices and deeply-held religious convictions to discover whether any synthesis of religion and politics is at all possible in an increasingly modernizing and globalizing world.

(Taught in English; Russian Eurasian Studies 313f)

With the collapse of the USSR we were told that history was dead and liberal democracy triumphant. There was a "third wave" of democratic change. How accurate have these optimistic characterizations turned out to be? After an introduction to theories of liberal democracy and to the new discipline of "transitology" we will look at how states and leaders have applied such liberal-democratic ideas in Eastern Europe and the former USSR (with comparative examples from Africa and South America), and with what success.

(Spring) Silk Roads: Ancient and Modern Highways across the Eurasian Continent

(Taught in English; Politics 312)

The silk roads were ancient transportation and trade links that wound their way across the Eurasian continent, or by sea through the South China Sea and Indian Ocean, to Europe. They carried silk, glass, jade, and moved religions and literatures across continents. Today, the new silk roads carry oil, gas, drugs, capitalism, and immigrants seeking better lives. We will investigate the parallels between the ancient and modern silk roads and the contemporary strategic, cultural, and economic significance of these new highways, which link China, Central Asia, the Middle East, South Asia, and Europe.

(Fall) Seminar on Electoral Systems - *Not offered this year/term

This course examines the American electoral system, analyzes its strengths and weaknesses, and considers whether alternative systems used in other democracies are superior. Can American elections be made fairer, more representative, and more democratic? Can voting become a more meaningful and effective political act? Among the topics: theories of representation, the Electoral College, term limits, winner-take-all vs. proportional voting systems, gerrymandering, and representation of women and racial minorities.

(Spring) Memories of Overdevelopment - *Not offered this year/term

On unsettling features of modern and late modern society. These include the alienated relationship between the city and the country, the pursuit of infinite economic growth, the restless transformation of the landscape, the anonymity of power, the detachment of the individual from traditional communities, the triumph of commodity fetishism, and the erosion of public space. We assess theoretical critiques of the sovereign subject, the civilization of productivity, and environmental thoughtlessness, as well as practical efforts to change the trajectory of our age.

(Fall) War and Peace in South Asia

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Multiple forms of conflict and violence fueled by economic inequality, political instability, and rising radicalism mark South Asia--a region of contested histories, ideologies, and territories. We will explore the histories and causes of enduring conflicts, such as Kashmir and the wars in Afghanistan, separatist movements in Pakistan, India, and Sri Lanka, and potential conflicts over scarce water and energy resources. We will conclude with analysis of the role of external powers, such as China, Iran, and the U.S. in South Asia and assess the prospects for peace in the region.

(Fall) Democratization and Civil Society in East Asia

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course examines the dramatic emergence of democratic institutions and civil society in East Asia. The primary aim of the class is to help students understand and analyze the process of democratic unfolding in Japan, Korea, and Taiwan. We will also evaluate China's recent, albeit limited experiments with democratic practices. We will begin by contrasting Western perspectives of democracy with both traditional and more contemporary Asian understandings of democracy. We will then focus on the actual processes of democratic consolidation in each of the cases, especially the developments that precipitated political crisis and ultimately, political change.

(Spring) Politics & Rhetoric - *Not offered this year/term

(Writing-intensive)

People have long accused politicians of using rhetoric to pander to audiences and get what they want regardless of the truth. But politics, especially democratic politics, depends on communication to persuade and motivate others. What is the relationship between speech and politics? Can we have political communication without rhetoric? How can citizens use speech to improve democracy? What are the political effects of different rhetorical styles? How can speech help communities deal with conflict? The course will focus on these questions, moving from classical writings on rhetoric to contemporary democratic political theory.

(Spring) Dictatorships, Democracies and Human Rights in Latin America

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

During the 1960s and 70s military coups brought authoritarian regimes to power in Argentina, Brazil, Chile and Uruguay. In an effort to prevent what was perceived as imminent socialist revolutions, they launched repressive campaigns aimed at demobilizing labor and eliminating dissent. The 1980s saw the establishment of democratic regimes in all four countries. The course will analyze the role of human rights movements in the transition and consolidation of democracy, as well as the design and implementation of transitional justice mechanisms in each of these cases.

(Fall) International Migration

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course examines migration and transnational processes from a comparative perspective. It focuses on the relationship between globalization and international migration, with special attention to transnational networks and diaspora politics. We will explore major theories, forms, and patterns of migration in global politics; the involvement of diaspora organizations in the politics of host and home states; and the implications of migration and refugee flows for state sovereignty, national identity, and citizenship. We will conclude by analyzing the key debates and framing of immigration policies and models of citizenship in Europe and the United States.

(Spring) Decision Making

On decision making, and the pathologies of decision making, in American politics. When, and to what extent, can we say that a particular policy decision is the result of rational choice, institutional processes, pluralistic pressures, or other forces? When are individual or collective decisions likely to be marred by "groupthink," selective attention, or self-deception? To what extent, if at all, may collective decisions be considered rational or moral? When are challenges to authority, or to dominant opinion, likely to make a difference?

(Spring) Pivotal Political Ideas: Political Violence

Preamble (for topics courses): This course explores such contested terms of political discourse as freedom, alienation, power, democracy, conservatism, cosmopolitanism, and the public sphere - as those concepts have been interpreted by diverse currents of political thought. Each year we will highlight a different conceptual theme.

Societies pride themselves on being civilized when they transcend rule by violence and implant rule by law. Civilized societies pride themselves on being liberal democracies when they recognize the political equality of all citizens, represent the interest of those citizens in government, and make decisions through peaceful deliberation and compromise. But what exactly is violence, and what is wrong with it? Does it entail physical force, or can violence be present when bloodshed is absent? Is it a means to power, an expression of powerlessness, or both? Is justice always served by the exit of violence from social life? Are liberal democracy and violence truly antithetical?

(Spring) Pivotal Political Ideas: Citizen and the Foreigner - *Not offered this year/term

Preamble (for topics courses): This course explores such contested terms of political discourse as freedom, alienation, power, democracy, conservatism, cosmopolitanism, and the public sphere - as those concepts have been interpreted by diverse currents of political thought. Each year we will highlight a different conceptual theme.

This year we will examine the idea of the citizen and the foreigner, examining both classic theories of citizenship and challenges to those theories posed by diasporic groups and other cultural strangers such as exiles, refugees, economic migrants, and stateless populations. We also will consider the pressures placed on classic notions of citizenship by transnational social and environmental problems, as well as by the power of global economic forces over domestic political communities.

First-year seminar

Is intellectual and physical performance enhanced by neuroactive chemicals? Will reproductive technology obviate the necessity of the biological womb? What is the limit of life extension? Of interest is the application of technology to human enhancement. The course departs from a survey of current attempts to restore human function, and moves to a consideration of the imagined futures of nanotechnology, biotechnology, information technology, and cognitive science. A context for enhancement is found in modern fiction (e.g., Shelley's Frankenstein) and culture (e.g., the eugenics movement), and postmodern philosophy (e.g., transhumanism) and literature (e.g., cyberpunk).

(Fall) What Is Memory?

(Speaking-intensive; Gender Studies 212f (1))

Memory has a wide range of meanings and applications in many different contexts. What, for example, is the difference between artificial intelligence and human memory? How are national identities constructed around the commemoration of great events? What is the importance of memory in relation to concepts like justice and progress? How do rituals and performances work to determine gender and other identities? How can we understand the differences in episodic, implicit, long-term, short-term, or working memory? For individuals and societies, what are the implications of the absence of memory? We examine psychological, social, political, and cultural approaches to understanding memory.

Prerequisites: Prereq sophomore or junior; first years with permission of the instructor

(Fall) Theories of Personality

How do individuals differ and how are they the same? What factors shape the development of our personalities? This course will introduce students to some of the major theories of personality, and will encourage critical analysis of the various theories. We will examine personality from the perspectives of psychoanalytical, humanist, and constructivist theories, as well as from the perspective of positive psychology.

Prerequisites: 100 level psychology course

Instructors: A. Douglas

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-222-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Spring) Abnormal Psychology: Clinical Perspectives

This survey course on abnormal psychology focuses on understanding diagnoses included in the American Psychiatric Association's Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders, Fourth Edition and their implications for the understanding and treatment of psychological disorders. Throughout the course we will question the concept of abnormality and examine its positive and negative effects in the amelioration of human suffering.

Prerequisites: 100-level psychology course

Instructors: M. Fingrutd

Expected enrollment: 25

PSYCH-230-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Developmental Psychology

Examines changes in cognitive, social, and emotional functioning, including theory and research that illuminate some central issues in characterizing these changes: the relative contributions of nature and nurture, the influence of the context on development, continuity versus discontinuity in development, and the concept of stage. Includes observations at the Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology or permission of instructor

Instructors: R. Shilkret

Expected enrollment: 40

(Fall) Educational Psychology

(Community-based learning course; Education 233fs)

What do we learn? How do we learn? Why do we learn? In this course, we will study issues of learning, teaching, and motivation that are central to educational psychology. We will explore the shifting paradigms within educational psychology, multiple subject matter areas, (dis)continuities between classroom and home cultures, students' prior experiences, teachers as learners, ethnic and gender identity in the classroom, and learning in out-of-school settings. Requires a prepracticum in a community-based setting.

Prerequisites: soph, jr or sr

Notes: Prepracticum required

Instructors: The department

PSYCH-236-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Adolescent Development

This course offers a comprehensive introduction to human development during adolescence. It considers historical and cultural forces that contribute to adolescence as a distinct segment of the life span. Contemporary problems confronting adolescents--such as crime, violence, gender, race, eating disorders, substance abuse, and depression--are also examined.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology

Instructors: E. Graham

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-240-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Spring) Visual and Auditory Perception

Why is it that some people, mostly men, cannot distinguish red socks from green ones? Why does the moon on the horizon appear larger than when it is overhead? How do Magic Eye pictures work? Why does the Mona Lisa's smile seem so elusive? This course addresses such questions by examining biological and psychological studies of the visual and auditory systems. Among the topics we will explore are object recognition; color vision; the perception of depth, size, and movement; the effects of experience on perception; sound localization; and the perception of pitch.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology

Instructors: M. Breen

PSYCH-241-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Cognitive Psychology

Cognition encompasses a range of phenomena that define our mental lives. This course considers empirical investigations and theoretical accounts of cognitive issues, including learning and memory, creativity and problem solving, decision making, attention, consciousness, and language.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology

Instructors: M. Breen

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-245-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Psychology of Music

(Music 245)

Every culture in the world has some form of music, but why did music evolve, and what function does it serve? In this course, we will explore the cognitive and neural processes that underlie music perception and production to ask the following questions: Does music have universal features that cross cultures? How does music convey emotion? What do infants know about music? Is music specifically human? And finally, what are the parallels between music and language? Through these questions, we hope to discover something about the origin of music and what makes it such an integral part of our daily lives.

Prerequisites: a 100 level course in Psychology or permission of instructor. Formal music training is not required for the course

Instructors: M. Breen

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-250-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Introduction to the Biological Bases of Behavior

(Neuroscience and Behavior 250f)

This course is an introduction to and survey of the biological bases of behavior, including physiological, biochemical, and neurophysiological determinants of sensation, motor control, sleep, eating and drinking, learning and memory, language, and mental disorders.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology, 4 credits in biological sciences, and instructor permission

Instructors: W. Millard

Expected enrollment: 50

PSYCH-250-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Spring) Introduction to the Biological Bases of Behavior

(Neuroscience and Behavior 250s)

This course is an introduction to and survey of the biological bases of behavior, including physiological, biochemical, and neurophysiological determinants of sensation, motor control, sleep, eating and drinking, learning and memory, language, and mental disorders.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology and 4 credits in biological sciences

Instructors: S. Tershner

Expected enrollment: 50

PSYCH-251-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Animal Behavior

(Speaking-intensive)

Examines the development, causal mechanisms, evolutionary history, and function of the behavior of animals. Topics include sensory capacities, predator evasion, reproduction, parental care, social behavior, and learning.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology

Instructors: K. Hollis

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-252-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Bon Appetit! Food, Appetite, and Culture

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

Food is energy, an occasion for intimacy, and often a cause of aggression and pathology. The provenance of food preferences in humans and other species is considered from the perspectives of anthropology, biology, neuroscience, and psychology. Specific topics include the sensory properties of food, attitudes toward food, the psychology of ingestion, and the neuroscience of feeding.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology

Instructors: W. Millard

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-295-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Independent Study

Credits/PE Units: 1-4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Independent study programs are arranged with individual faculty members in the department.

Prerequisites: permission of instructor

Instructors: The department

PSYCH-295-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

PSYCH-310-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Laboratory: Research Methods in Social Psychology - *Not offered this year/term

This course is an introduction to laboratory and field methods in social psychology: methodology, data analysis, ethical problems, statistical inference, and research design. All students are expected to design and conduct a research project.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and permission of instructor

Instructors: F. Deutsch

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-319-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Spring) Seminar in Social Psychology: Gender and Domestic Labor - *Not offered this year/term

(Gender Studies 333s(04))

This course examines social psychology and sociological theories and research addressing why women do more housework and child care than men. It pays special attention to the situation of dual-earner families and considers class and ethnic differences on the nature of this inequality and the barriers to full equality at home.

Prerequisites: permission of instructor. Students must meet with instructor during advising week to get permission to enter the course.

Instructors: F. Deutsch

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-320-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Spring) Concepts of Abnormality

This course is a study of how maladaptive patterns of thought and action are understood from a psychological viewpoint. Behaviors ranging from neurotic to psychotic are studied in terms of underlying character structure and origins in childhood experience. Competing psychoanalytic theories are brought to bear on these phenomena.

Prerequisites: jr, sr (permission required for exceptions), two prior psychology courses, Psychology 230 recommended

Instructors: R. Shilkret

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-323-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Laboratory in Qualitative Research - *Not offered this year/term

(Writing-intensive)

This course offers a hands-on introduction to methods of psychological research that focus on the qualitative description and analysis of human experience. Students learn a variety of techniques of data collection (interviewing, intensive observation, archival research) and methods of analyzing textual sources -- from historical accounts to blogs, memoirs, observational narratives, and interview transcripts. Readings focus on specific methodological practices as well as on the history and philosophy of science differentiating qualitative methods from other approaches to psychological research. Students work both collaboratively and individually on projects throughout the course.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and permission of instructor.

Notes: This course also counts in the Social area of psychology.

Instructors: G. Hornstein

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-326-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Spring) Laboratory in Personality and Abnormal Psychology - *Not offered this year/term

This course is an introduction to research methods in abnormal and personality psychology. Students will work as a class to collect data using quantitative and qualitative methodologies. Students will be expected to collect survey- and questionnaire-based data as well as engage in some interviewing projects. We will consider the various stages of research including literature review, design, ethical considerations, data collection, and analysis (qualitative and quantitative), and consider the statistical inference or implications of our findings. The course focuses on the impact of stress and coping on the lives of individuals, identity, their relationships, and psychological adjustment.

Prerequisites: Jr. sr., Psych 200, 201; one course in the personality/abnormal area preferred, and permission of instructor

Instructors: A. Douglas

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-329-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Seminar in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: Psychology of Trauma

(Gender Studies 333f(01))

What happens after a traumatic event? Why do some people develop psychological disorders and others do not? This course will explore the psychological theories and research on trauma and stress. Topics covered will include childhood abuse, domestic violence, combat violence, community violence, and interpersonal violence. The seminar will explore psychological dysfunction, disorders, as well as adaptation and coping following exposure to traumatic stress. In addition, the course will explore the concept of "cultural trauma."

Prerequisites: 100 level psychology course; Psychology 200; jr or sr. A course in abnormal psychology preferred.

Instructors: A. Douglas

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-329-02 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Seminar in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: First-Person Narratives of Madness

(Speaking-intensive)

Psychologists have typically conceptualized "mental illness" in terms of the symptoms and diagnoses proposed by psychiatrists in the Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (DSM). These categories, while perhaps useful for prescribing medication, do little to help us understand the subjective experiences that are considered "mad." In this seminar, we analyze accounts (historical and contemporary) written by people who have experienced extreme states, intense emotions, or unusual perceptions or beliefs, to understand how these "counter-narratives" offer new insights into psychological life.

Prerequisites: A 100-level course in psychology, jr, sr and permission of instructor; Students with a background in literature particularly welcome.

Preference given to senior psychology and neuroscience majors

Notes: Students must submit an information sheet (form available in department office) by noon on Thursday of advising week to get permission to register for the course.

Instructors: G. Hornstein

Expected enrollment: 18

PSYCH-330-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Lab in Developmental Psychology: Factors Affecting the "Math Path" of Young Women

(Gender Studies 333f (07))

This course is a study of research methods in educational settings, focusing on observational, survey, and interview techniques and using as a context adolescent girls' educational experiences in mathematics. Students will be working directly with the SummerMath database, which spans more than 25 years. Students will develop skills in formulating research questions, designing research, and finding appropriate methods (both qualitative and quantitative) by which to analyze the data. Each student will complete a major research project.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201 and permission of instructor

Notes: Students should submit a statement of interest by email to the professor during advising week. This course can be counted in area C (Developmental and Educational Psychology) OR D (Perception and Cognition) of the curriculum.

Instructors: C. Morrow

Expected enrollment: 12

(Spring) Lab in Developmental Psychology: Psychological Perspectives on Adoption

Adoption has become a common way to create families in the United States and many other countries. The experience of adoptees, birth parents, and adoptive families raise many questions about family relationships, identities, and community membership. In this course we will look how adoption has been studied, with a particular focus on the experiences of adoptees and their adoptive parents. Students will develop research questions, consider different methods and related ethical issues, and analyze survey and interview data.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200; 201; and 230 or 236.

Instructors: P. Ramsey

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-330-02 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Lab in Developmental Psychology: Personality, Health, and Well-Being in Midlife

Recent research suggests that midlife is a unique phase and is distinct from younger and older adulthood. This course will cover the latest theory and research on midlife development, examining the psychological, biomedical and social aspects within the context of the adult lifespan. Students will conduct two research projects during the semester examining midlife using different methodologies, and give presentations on selected articles and lead in-class discussions. By the end of this course students will have developed their skills in writing coherent literature reviews, gain confidence using analytical methods (SPSS), and learn to write a high-quality research report.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201; and 230 or 236

Instructors: E. Graham

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-331-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Lab in Early Social and Personality Development

In the role of a participant-observer, each student studies intensively the social and personality development of the children in one classroom at the Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook. Students learn how to articulate developmental changes and individual differences by analyzing detailed observations. Topics include social cognition, peer relationships, social skills, concepts of friendship, emotional development, identity formation, self-esteem, and the social and cultural context of development.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201, and 230 or permission of instructor

Notes: 2 labs (3 hours each) required at Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook

Instructors: P. Ramsey

(Fall) Seminar in Developmental Psychology: Adult Development and Aging

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course will focus on the developmental changes that occur after adolescence. Specifically we will discuss emotional, cognitive and psychosocial changes across the adult lifespan, including middle age and older adulthood. Critical study of the theories and methods in the field will be addressed, and we will evaluate what it means to age successfully or unsuccessfully from various psychological perspectives.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201, and 230 or 236

Instructors: E. Graham

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-340-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Laboratory in Perception and Cognition: Cognition and Literacy

(Community-based learning course)

Adult illiteracy in the U.S. presents an ever-growing challenge. To understand this problem, we will learn various theories of reading. However, since many models of reading are based on data gathered from children, we will also examine how the cognitive abilities of adults are different from those of children. A large component of this class concerns learning the lab techniques associated with assessing reading abilities. In addition, since this is a community-based learning course, each student will become a tutor for an adult enrolled in an area literacy program.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology, 201, 200 and permission of instructor. Students must meet with the professor during advising week to get permission to enter the course.

Notes: 3 hours per week as a literacy tutor in Springfield is required.

Instructors: K. Binder

(Spring) Lab in Perception and Cognition: Speech

This course presents an overview of laboratory methods in cognitive psychology, including: research design, methodology, data analysis, and statistical inference. We will explore these issues through the lens of human communication; specifically, speech. Students will design and complete a research project in which they record and analyze speech to explore questions about how meaning is expressed through spoken language.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201 and 241

Instructors: M. Breen
Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-349-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Fall) Seminar in Perception and Cognition: Language and Thought

Languages differ in the way they describe the world. For example, the noun for bridge is feminine in German, but masculine in French. Russian has two words for blue, while English has only one. The Piraha (an Amazonian hunter-gatherer tribe) arguably have no number words. In this course, we will be asking to what extent these cross-linguistic differences are reflected in thought. That is, do German speakers think bridges are more feminine than French speakers do? Can Russian speakers discriminate different shades of blue better than English speakers? Can the Piraha count? In exploring these questions, we hope to discover how tightly linked language and thought are.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201, and 241.

Instructors: M. Breen
Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-350-01 - Psychology - 2011-2012

(Spring) Laboratory in Behavioral Neuroscience

This laboratory provides intensive study and discussion of specific topics in behavioral neuroscience, including psychopharmacology, neuroanatomy, electronics, and surgery. Examination of methods and experimentation in the laboratory.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201, and one of the following: Psychology 250 or Biological Sciences 333; and permission of instructor

Notes: Interested students must meet with the instructor before or during the advising week to obtain additional information about the course.

Instructors: W. Millard
Expected enrollment: 12

(Spring) Seminar: Biological Bases of Behavior: Of Madness and Molecules: Seminar in Neuropsychopharmacology

Charpentier, a French scientist of the 1940s, unwittingly discovered a chemical that was to alter dramatically our understanding of madness. The chemical, chlorpromazine, has been widely used for the treatment of psychosis. Of interest is neuropsychopharmacology--the science and the technology. The principles of pharmacology are discussed and precede the examination of applications of the technology to psychopathology (for example, schizophrenia, depression, anxiety, and violent behavior).

Prerequisites: Psychology 250 or Biological Sciences 333 and permission of instructor. Preference given to junior and senior psychology and neuroscience and behavior majors

Instructors: W. Millard

(Fall) Examining Features of Shape and Measuring Space in One, Two, and Three Dimensions

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Mathematics 201)

We will work with 2D and 3D shapes, develop mathematical vocabulary regarding features of shapes, and explore definitions and properties of geometric objects. The seminar includes a study of angle, similarity, congruence, and the relationship between 3D objects and their 2D representations. The measurement component will provide opportunities to examine different attributes of size, develop facility in composing and decomposing shapes, and apply these skills to make sense of formulas for area and volume. As we explore the conceptual issues of length, area, and volume and their complex interrelationships, we will also examine how children develop these ideas.

(Fall) Racism and Inequality in Schools and Society

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Community-based learning course; Writing-intensive)

What is race? Who decides? Are we a "postracial" society? This course focuses on historical, social, psychological, and legal underpinnings of the social construction of race and examines how perspectives on race have influenced the lives of students and teachers in schools. Class sessions compare the old vs. "new" racism, contrast the workings of white privilege with calls for white responsibility, explore perspectives on the "achievement" and "opportunity" gaps, and examine how antiracist pedagogies can address inequities in education at the curricular, interpersonal, and institutional levels. Essays, response papers, field experiences, and a digital media project are required.

(January) Observing and Assisting in Inclusive Classrooms

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Students are expected to complete a supervised field experience full-time every day during the January Term in an inclusive classroom in a school setting. Placements can be located within or outside of the Five College area. In addition to the field experience component, students attend three course meetings (detailed below). Reading and writing assignments focus on a survey of learning disabilities, descriptions of special education programs, understanding Individuals with Disabilities Education Act policies and placement options, interpreting Individualized Education Program plans, and planning curriculum for inclusive classrooms.

Prerequisites: One of the following: Psychology 230, 233, 236, Education 205, Educational Studies 215 or permission of instructor. Three mandatory meetings (2 hours each): two in November and one in Feb. Prepracticum: five days a week for three weeks in January; permission to participate in prepracticum experience for credit is contingent upon attendance at the meetings in November. Consult Ms. Lawrence or Ms. Carlisle in October for exact dates of the November course meetings.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Jewish Studies 215)

Along with such genres as letters, ethical wills, travel accounts, and other personal communications, spiritual autobiographies and diaries often reveal what people actually thought and felt about matters important to them. These sources provide insight into religion as lived experience. This course studies autobiographical accounts of Jewish religious figures from the medieval period to the contemporary. We include narratives by both women and men, philosophers, mystics, messianic pretenders, travelers, authors of Holocaust memoirs, and other contemporary Jews. Taken together, such accounts bring to life the diversity of spiritual quests in which Jews have engaged.

(Jewish Studies 225)

The Sabbath, the notion and institution of a day of rest, appears to have been innovated in ancient Israel, as evidenced by the Hebrew Bible. This course systematically explores the origins, development, and nature of the Sabbath in Judaism, including desisting from labor and worldly pursuits, and as an opportunity for spiritual rejuvenation and communal celebration. How has the observance of the Sabbath changed over time, and varied among different regional communities? How has it evolved in our own time? We will also take a comparative approach by studying Sabbath or days of rest in other religious traditions, including both Western and Asian cultures.

In the first millennium, Christianity thrived throughout the Middle East. Because Roman Catholic and Protestant churches later declared many of these Christians to be heretics, their stories have often been excluded from the history of Christianity. This course challenges the assumption of Christianity as a "Western" religion and asks how our understanding of global Christianity changes when we include the history and perspective of Eastern Christians. We will read such sources as the tale of a transvestite nun, a letter allegedly written by Jesus, ancient Christian hymns, the story of a demon-possessed monastery, and the first Christian writings on Islam.

(Spring) Women and Buddhism

(Gender Studies 210s(03))

This course explores women and Buddhism during different historical periods and in different cultures. Through a variety of sources, this course will illuminate Buddhist concepts of gender and sexuality, views of women's spiritual capacities, the diversity of women's images, roles, experiences, concerns, and contributions in Buddhist societies, and scholarly approaches to women in Buddhism. Special attention will be given to how gender is constructed in each cultural and religious context encountered, with particular emphasis on Buddhist women in Southeast Asia. We will look into the reasons why texts on religion have not always included the voices of women, and we will investigate ways to uncover them through research techniques and alternative hermeneutical strategies.

(Spring) Women in the Bible

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course will explore the representation of women in the Hebrew Bible and the New Testament. We will begin by discussing a spectrum of feminist approaches to the interpretation of the Bible, ranging from those who condemn the Bible as fundamentally and inevitably patriarchal to those who seek ways to understand the Bible in less patriarchal and more feminist terms. We will then survey the biblical, apocryphal, and select non-canonical writings that are most relevant for women, as well as interpretations by contemporary feminist scholars. This course should help students better articulate their own views on how the Bible represents women.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Already in the 18th century, radical biblical critics offered a potent challenge to the churches of the day. Some called into question the Bible's historical accuracy. Others denied the relevance of the biblical narratives even if critical scholarship could reconstruct what had actually happened. Emerging conservative and liberal parties within the churches differed on how best to respond to this radical scholarship, and their differences generated heated polemics as well as heresy trials. In this course, we will examine some of the efforts to explain what happened in Palestine so long ago and also how these issues continue to inform both religion and politics in the United States today.

(Spring) Topics in New Testament: Paul and the Earliest Christians

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This seminar explores theological patterns in early Christianity as reflected in the literature of the New Testament. In any given semester, it is organized around a particular theme (e.g., eschatology, christology, ethics, soteriology) or it may be organized around a particular person or literature (such as Pauline thought, Johannine thought). Topics are announced in advance of the semester in which the course is to be given.

This course analyzes the earliest surviving Christian documents, the writings of the apostle Paul and his immediate followers. We will examine both those works that made it into the New Testament canon (e.g., Paul's letters, the Acts of the Apostles, the deuterio-Pauline epistles) and those that did not (e.g. the Acts of Paul and Thecla). We will emphasize the general outlines of Paul's theology as well as its application to particular questions in his day.

Seminar topics include people, periods, or problems that have a particular bearing on religion in America.

A distinctive mark of Western thought in the nineteenth century was its fascination with "the origin of things." The origin of the species and the origin of the universe are two prime examples. These two concerns, in particular, had a decisive impact on how religion and science came to be understood and expressed in the twentieth century. As a consequence of the ensuing public debate, this question of "origins" presented a direct challenge to the received theory of creation, the meaning of miracles, as well as the nature of biblical inspiration.

(Spring) First-Year Seminar: Anna Karenina: Loving to Death - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English)

Leo Tolstoy's Anna Karenina is an action-packed drama about love and passion, personal freedom and societal expectations, and the costs of living. We will read the text slowly, with attention to the ambiguities that defeat a clear or simple interpretation of the novel's message. We will screen films of Anna Karenina and assess interpretations of the novel.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: To the Last Station: Tolstoy after Anna Karenina - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English)

2010 marks the centenary of the death of Leo Tolstoy (1828-1910). We will read fiction, essays, and letters that Tolstoy wrote after his masterworks War and Peace and Anna Karenina. Readings include: The Death of Ivan Ilyich, The Power of Darkness, Kreutzer Sonata, Why Do Men Stupefy Themselves?, The Devil, Hadji Murat, and I Cannot Be Silent. We will concurrently read Jay Parini's novel, The Last Station, a portrait of the final years of Tolstoy's life, as well as memoirs by Tolstoy's family and friends. These diverse texts offer contradictory evidence about what happened in Tolstoy's final years.

(Fall) Great Books: The Literature of Nineteenth-Century Russia

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

In no other culture has literature occupied the central role it enjoyed in nineteenth-century Russia. Political, social, and historical constraints propelled Russian writers into the roles of witness, prophet, and sage. Yet, far from being limited to the vast, dark "Big Question" novels of legend, Russian literature offers much humor, lyricism, and fantasy. We will focus on the Russian novel as a reaction to western European forms of narrative and consider the recurring pattern of the strong heroine and the weak hero. Authors will include: Pushkin, Lermontov, Gogol, Turgenev, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, and Chekhov.

(Spring) Topics in Twentieth-Century Russian Literature: Abandoned Hopes: The Russian 20th Century in Literature and Film

(Taught in English; Film Studies 270)

This course will survey the dramatic history of Russia in the 20th century through the prism of its cultural achievement. How did aesthetic forms -- literature and film -- reflect on the age of war, revolution, and terror, characterized by absolute power and stalwart resistance? What means of cultural expression emerged in response to the bloody and often dehumanizing diction of the Soviet period? The task of this course is both to assess the historical panorama of a decisive and difficult period and to zoom in on its especially characteristic works, including literature by Shklovsky, Babel, Bulgakov, Grossman, Khams and Brodsky, and films by Eisenstein, Tarkovsky, and Paradjanov.

(Spring) Tolstoy's War and Peace - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

Throughout his life and in his art, Tolstoy sought to shape experience into a single and all-embracing philosophical principle, but he was never able to suppress his extravagant intuition that existence, being contradictory, fragmentary, and ultimately subject to forces beyond human control, defeated attempts at codification. We will read War and Peace in an attempt to understand how that irresolvable conflict fuels Tolstoy's intellectual pursuits and informs his theories on art.

(Spring) Dostoevsky and the Problem of Evil: The Brothers Karamazov - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

Perhaps no other novelist has delved as deeply into the psychological and metaphysical dimensions of evil as the Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoevsky. This course will be devoted to a close reading of Dostoevsky's landmark novel of murderous passion and parricide, The Brothers Karamazov. Why should crime and transgression be a privileged avenue of access into the human interior? How is psychology tied to the metaphysical aspect of human existence? What are the sources of evil--and redemption?

(Taught in English; Politics 209s, European Studies 240s)

Russia was transformed by communist revolution into a global superpower that challenged the dominant ideologies of liberalism and nationalism. It became a powerful alternative to capitalism. In 1991, this imperial state collapsed and underwent an economic, political, and cultural revolution. What explains the Soviet Union's success for 70 years and its demise in 1991? What sort of country is Russia as it enters the twenty-first century? Is it a democracy?

(Taught in English; Politics 264f)

Since its creation at the beginning of the twentieth century, the Soviet Union dominated the minds of Western foreign policymakers. None of the West's policies in the Middle East, the Third World, Europe, or China after World War II can be understood without an understanding of Soviet foreign policy. We will examine the development of Soviet foreign policy since 1917 and the role played by Russia and the former Soviet republics in the far more complex "New World Order" we live in today. How have the expansion of the European Union, the tragedy of 9/11, and the war against terrorism influenced Russia's relations with the West?

(Taught in English; Politics 242s)

Following the collapse of the USSR and the Gulf War, Central Asia and the Caucasus became new centers of geopolitical rivalry. The new states are a source of energy (oil and gas) for Western powers and a vital transit corridor between Eastern Europe and China. While a new "Great Game" is being fought between Western, Far Eastern, and Middle Eastern powers for control over energy pipelines, the region is threatened by environmental catastrophe and water shortages. Is the new oil industry a source of prosperity or an instrument for exploitation, corruption, and instability? How important are the new states to the West's strategic energy interests?

RES-251-01 - Russian and Eurasian Studies - 2011-2012

(Fall) Advanced Russian Language: From Reading to Speaking

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement; does not meet a distribution requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): We will study a variety of texts and set them into the cultural context that marks them as distinctly Russian. Texts will be selected from a broad range of genres and sources. Readings, discussions, short oral and written reports. Special attention to complex grammatical constructions and vocabulary building. Taught in Russian.

The course is intended for students who have completed at least four semesters of Russian or the equivalent. Heritage learners of Russian (those who speak the language) will also benefit from the course. With a strong emphasis on integrating vocabulary in context, this course aims to help students advance their lexicon and grammar, increase fluency, and overcome speaking inhibitions. Texts will include short stories, films, and interviews. Frequent short writing assignments.

(Spring) Advanced Russian Film and Literature

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement
(Film Studies 220s)

Students will view films, read excerpts from Soviet and Russian prose about childhood and coming of age, and study the socio-cultural aspects of becoming an adult in Russia. Films will include: Ivan's Childhood, The Scarecrow, The Thief, and The Return. Readings will include literary texts and film reviews. We will continue to work on oral and writing skills, and vocabulary. This course prepares students to express opinions, ideas, points of view, and critiques on films, social issues and cultural phenomena using more complex and rich language.

(Spring) Silk Roads: Ancient and Modern Highways across the Eurasian Continent

(Taught in English; Politics 312)

The silk roads were ancient transportation and trade links that wound their way across the Eurasian continent, or by sea through the South China Sea and Indian Ocean, to Europe. They carried silk, glass, jade, and moved religions and literatures across continents. Today, the new silk roads carry oil, gas, drugs, capitalism, and immigrants seeking better lives. We will investigate the parallels between the ancient and modern silk roads and the contemporary strategic, cultural, and economic significance of these new highways, which link China, Central Asia, the Middle East, South Asia, and Europe.

(Fall) The New Democracies

(Taught in English; Politics 300f)

With the collapse of the USSR we were told that history was dead and liberal democracy triumphant. There was a "third wave" of democratic change. How accurate have these optimistic characterizations turned out to be? After an introduction to theories of liberal democracy and to the new discipline of "transitology" we will look at how states and leaders have applied such liberal-democratic ideas in Eastern Europe and the former USSR (with comparative examples from Africa and South America), and with what success.

(Spring) Nationalism - *Not offered this year/term

(Taught in English; Politics 308s)

Nationalism is one of the greatest challenges to multiethnic states. They have had to create new strategies to deal with the demands of ethnic minorities. Taking the four states of Spain, Canada, Russia, and the former Yugoslavia as examples, we will focus on nationalist movements within these states and the central governments' responses. What has been the effect of the Communist legacy? Are there alternatives to federalism as a way of managing national claims? What socioeconomic policies have governments used to control ethnic tensions? What role can international organizations play in finding solutions to ethnic conflict?

Revolutions have a rich and bloody history on the European continent. In the twentieth century, there were frequent revolutionary upheavals, particularly in Russia and Eastern Europe. We will study two revolutionary periods: Russia in 1917 and the USSR in 1991. These revolutionary events present great contrasts, yet at the same time clarify the nature of revolutions and why they occur. Do they bring the expected fundamental and accelerated change people hope for? Our focus will be on the contrasts and parallels between Russia's early twentieth-century socialist revolution and late twentieth-century capitalist revolution. (Spring) Issues in Sociology: Sociology of Popular Culture

There is little question that popular culture occupies a central role in the contemporary social world. For some scholars, popular culture serves a social function akin to traditional religion, acting as a form of social solidarity by promoting collective ideas, experiences, and identities. A more critical approach views popular culture as a form of ideological domination, promoting the interests of certain social groups at the expense of others. This course will examine these theories by exploring both the social factors that help influence the production and consumption of popular culture as well as the ways in which popular culture itself helps shape society.

This course is an overview of sociological research on mass media in which students are introduced to research at the early Chicago School of sociology (Park), the Frankfurt School tradition (Adorno, Horkheimer, and later Habermas) the Columbia School tradition (Katz, Lazarsfeld), field theory (Bourdieu, Benson), and more recent American cultural perspectives on media (Alexander, STRONG program). The relationship between democracy and the media is a central theme. In the second half of the course, students will be asked to develop their own projects which analyze a contemporary mass media system, such as television news, blogs, social networking, etc.

(Spring) First-Year Seminar: The Other in the Media: (New) Media and Otherness in the Americas - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English)

Preamble (for topics courses): A seminar in Reading Writing and Reasoning, taught in English

New technologies (Internet, wireless devices, digital storytelling) are changing the media landscape as well as social, political, and economic relationships. The "other" media is reshaping the notion of otherness itself, as new forms of representation (self-produced, instantly available, some times unfiltered) continue to emerge and consolidate worldwide. This class examines how traditionally marginalized groups, including the Zapatistas in Mexico, at-risk youth in Brazil, and Latino communities in the U.S., utilize new media to gain visibility and tell their stories in their own voice (in English).

(Fall) Identities and Intersections: An Introduction: Afro-Latina/o Diasporic Performance

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Latin American Studies 287f(02))

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to issues of identity (gender, sexual, ethnic, cultural, class, national, religious) in the Spanish-speaking world and their intersections with other dimensions of cultural agency and power differentials. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course focuses on performance practices rooted in the African diaspora of the Americas, with particular attention to how race, ethnicity, sexuality, class, and gender are articulated in multiple aesthetic approaches. We will interrogate how these performances have functioned and continue to inspire political transformation as well as the recovery of shared histories of the Afro-Latina/o diaspora.

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to issues of identity (gender, sexual, ethnic, cultural, class, national, religious) in the Spanish-speaking world and their intersections with other dimensions of cultural agency and power differentials. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This survey course studies the complex histories and identities of blacks in Spain from the early medieval period to the present. The aim of this course is to learn a new historical perspective that brings into focus the role of black Africans (or those of African descent) as significant actors in the construction of Spain. An interdisciplinary approach will take us from the first visual representation of blacks in Alfonso X's Cantigas in the thirteenth century, through the plays based on the Renaissance black scholar Juan Latino, to the contemporary musical contributions of Hijas del Sol and Buika. (Spring) Identities and Intersections: An Introduction: Nomadic Imaginaries: The Cosmopolitan Andes

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to issues of identity (gender, sexual, ethnic, cultural, class, national, religious) in the Spanish-speaking world and their intersections with other dimensions of cultural agency and power differentials. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

One of the most important sociocultural phenomena in the twentieth-century Andes was the migration from rural towns to cities. However, in the twenty-first century, the central Andes is largely "elsewhere": New York City, Madrid, Buenos Aires, and Quebec. We will work with the theme of cosmopolitanism across three scales. First, how did the indigenous populations of the rural Andes transform the urban "lettered cities" of Quito, Lima, and La Paz? Second, how do Andean novelists and poets living in the U.S., such as Edmundo Paz-Soldán and Eduardo Mitre, reflect "lo andino" from afar? And third, how have a series of ancient texts on journeys been recently recapitulated within the region?

(Fall) Visual Cultures: An Introduction: Avant-Garde Image/Text: Locating the New

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

The "new" that defines an avant-garde aesthetic is characterized by the collision between visual images and written words. W.J.T. Mitchell has opined, "the 'differences' between images and language are in practice, linked to things like the difference between the (speaking) self and the (seen) others; between 'hearsay' and 'eyewitness' testimony." Considering the 1920s, the 1960s, and today, we will look at manifestos, magazines, and poetry - print and electronic - that combine the written word with pictographic images to think through the "new" in literary culture as movement across semiotic registers and geographic planes: Peru, Bolivia, Argentina, Brazil, and Spain.

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course offers Latina/o and Latin American transnational approaches to the theory and political practice of performance in the Americas with a focus on issues of race, sexuality, class, gender, indigenous and diasporic identities. Employing multiple modes of performance from theater, dance, performance art, ritual, visual art, and folkloric music, we will explore how these practices have functioned and continue to allow for politically subversive or resistant transformation.

(Fall) Visual Cultures: An Introduction: Spanish and Latin American Cinema

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Film Studies 203 (01))

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This semester's course offers a broad introduction to the history, politics and aesthetics of Latin American and Spanish cinema. The course also introduces students to the basic terminology and methodologies of film studies.

Prerequisites: Spanish 212 or permission of instructor

Notes: Weekly evening screenings.

Instructors: J. Crumbaugh

Expected enrollment: 16

(Fall) Concepts and Practices of Power: An Introduction: Introduction to Latina/o Studies

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Latin American Studies 287f(01))

Preamble (for topics courses): A historical approach to the analysis of political discourses and economic relations in Latin America, Spain and Latina/o cultures in the United States. Topics may include, but are not limited to, imperialism, (post/neo)colonialism, (trans)nationalism, migration, globalization, and neoliberalism. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course offers an introduction to the study of Latina/o communities in the United States. We will explore major concepts and debates in the growing field of Latina/o studies, through the study of texts across disciplines including history, sociology, performance theory, personal narrative, and ethnography. This interdisciplinary approach will provide us with rich frameworks to interrogate how Latinas/os negotiate complex identities across communities and specific geographic and political contexts.

(Fall) Advanced Studies in Identities and Intersections: Spain and Islam

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course will explore questions and concerns regarding the "Islamic constant" of Spanish history. We will focus on four major political and cultural contexts: the coexistence and conflicts among Jews, Muslims, and Christians in Medieval Iberia; the "moriscos" (converted Muslims) of Imperial Spain (sixteenth-seventeenth centuries); Spanish orientalism and colonial enterprises in Africa between the end of the nineteenth and the first half of the twentieth centuries; and the question of the Muslim emigrants in contemporary Spain. Readings will include literary texts, political and legal documents, historical accounts, and other cultural material such as architecture, film, and documentaries.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Latin American Studies 387s(01), Gender Studies 333s(05))

This course offers an interdisciplinary approach to the study of feminist ideologies among Latinas throughout the United States. Employing a range of sources from archival texts to artistic images and ethnographies, we will study the histories and representations of Latina feminist theories across academic and aesthetic approaches. Focusing on the multiplicity of lived experiences among Puertoorriqueñas, Chicanas, Mexicanas, Centroamericanas, Dominicanas, Suramericanas and many other communities in the United States, we will interrogate how gender and sexuality have informed the development of Latina feminist movements and political histories.

(Spring) Advanced Studies in Visual Cultures: Natural's Not in It: Pedro Almodóvar

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; Film Studies 380-01)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

This course studies the films of Pedro Almodóvar, European cinema's favorite bad boy turned acclaimed auteur. On the one hand, students learn to situate films within the context of contemporary Spanish history (the transition to democracy, the advent of globalization, etc.) in order to consider the local contours of postmodern aesthetics. On the other hand, the films provide a springboard to reflect on larger theoretical and ethical debates. For instance, what can a weeping transvestite teach us about desire? What happens when plastic surgery and organ transplants become metaphors? Under what circumstances, if any, can spectators find child prostitution cute?

(Spring) Advanced Studies in Visual Cultures: The Other (in the) Media: New Media and Otherness in the Americas

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Community-based learning course; Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

New technologies (Internet, wireless devices, digital storytelling) are changing the media landscape as well as social, political, and economic relationships. The "other" media is reshaping the notion of otherness itself, as new forms of representation--self-produced, instantly available, sometimes unfiltered--continue to emerge and consolidate worldwide. This class examines how traditionally marginalized groups, including the Zapatistas in Mexico, at-risk youth in Brazil, and Latino communities in the U.S., utilize new media to gain visibility and tell their stories in their own voice.

(Fall) Advanced Studies in Concepts and Practices of Power: Community Narratives: Digital Storytelling in Springfield, Massachusetts

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Community-based learning course; Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This CBL course examines how digital storytelling enables communities to express themselves and gain social visibility through literary and media discourses. How do traditionally marginalized communities tell their own stories? Together with the Springfield-based Latino Youth Media Institute, students will research and produce digital stories on issues that affect the North End community in Springfield. Throughout the semester students will alternate classroom instruction and off-campus work (transportation arranged by the College).

(Spring) Advanced Studies in Concepts and Practices of Power: Vital Possibilities: Inscribed Bodies and Living Texts in Latin America

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Artistic encounters between audiences, texts, and artists draw to the fore the tensions between individual human agency and the confines of our social conditioning. Drawing upon the philosophical work of J.C. Mariátegui, C. Vallejo, J. Butler, H. Bergson, and G. Deleuze, we will think about the paradoxical confines of human agency in contemporary Latin America. We will constantly interrogate the term "vital" as connected to aesthetics. We will explore a range of performance works as well as novels and short stories by Jorge Luis Borges, Diamela Eltit, and Alison Spedding, in order to conceive of the physical body as a textual palimpsest and the written text as a breathing organ.

(Taught in English; Romance Languages & Cultures 375, Italian 361, French 321)

Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student's choice.

Travel literature has always been a precious source for the study of culture, politics, arts and, last but not least, people. From Tacitus to Marco Polo, from Stendhal to Camilo Jose Cela, we will read and discuss authors who traveled for political, personal, and recreational reasons. We will also pay special attention to tales of emigration and immigration in the third millennium.

Prerequisites: for language majors: two courses in culture and literature at the 200-level

Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French, Italian, or Spanish must read texts and write papers in the Romance language for which they wish to receive credit.

STAT-140-01 - Statistics - 2011-2012

(Fall) Introduction to the Ideas and Applications of Statistics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

This course provides an overview of statistical methods, their conceptual underpinnings, and their use in various settings taken from current news, as well as from the physical, biological, and social sciences. Topics will include exploring distributions and relationships, planning for data production, sampling distributions, basic ideas of inference (confidence intervals and hypothesis tests), inference for distributions, and inference for relationships, including chi-square methods for two-way tables and regression.

Prerequisites: 2 years of high school algebra

Instructors: J. Kim

(Fall) Elementary Data Analysis and Experimental Design

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

A fundamental fact of science is that repeated measurements exhibit variability. The course presents ways to design experiments that will reveal systematic patterns while "controlling" the effects of variability and methods for the statistical analysis of data from well-designed experiments. Topics include completely randomized, randomized complete block, Latin Square and factorial designs, and their analysis of variance. The course emphasizes applications, with examples drawn principally from biology, psychology, and medicine.

Prerequisites: Any 100-level mathematics or statistics course or permission of instructor.

(Spring) Linear Statistical Models - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Mathematical concepts from linear algebra and n-dimensional Euclidean geometry, together with statistical concepts of estimation and hypothesis testing, are developed and used to construct a unifying theory for two classes of applied methods: analysis of variance and regression analysis. The theory is developed in three stages: least squares and orthogonal projections; moment assumptions and the Gauss-Markov theorem; and the normal distribution and F-tests.

(Mathematics 342f)

This course develops the ideas of probability simultaneously from experimental and theoretical perspectives. The laboratory provides a range of experiences that enhance and sharpen the theoretical approach and, moreover, allows us to observe regularities in complex phenomena and to conjecture theorems. Topics include: introductory experiments; axiomatic probability; random variables, expectation, and variance; discrete distributions; continuous distributions; stochastic processes; functions of random variables; estimation and hypothesis testing.

STAT-343-01 - Statistics - 2011-2012

(Spring) Mathematical Statistics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

This course is an introduction to the mathematical theory of statistics and to the application of that theory to the real world. Topics include probability, random variables, special distributions, introduction to estimation of parameters, and hypothesis testing.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 202 and 342

Notes: offered every spring semester alternately at Mount Holyoke and Smith Colleges; offered at Mount Holyoke in spring 2014.

THEAT-120-01 - Theatre Arts - 2011-2012

(Spring) Topics in Design: Costume Construction

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement
This course will take you through the theatrical process of creating clothing and accessories for the stage. Hand sewing techniques, fabric use and identification, and clothing alterations are covered. We will explore basic pattern drafting and draping, and some accessory construction will also be covered.
Prerequisites: preference to fy and so
Notes: lab fee $25; additional purchase of construction supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student.

Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-122-01 - Theatre Arts - 2011-2012

(Fall) Design I

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

An introduction to the art and work of the set and costume designer in the performing arts. Students will learn how a designer approaches a script, how their work impacts a production, and what means are used in the execution of this process. They will learn how to develop their own visual imaginations and how to create visual concepts through discussions, renderings, and models. No previous experience in theatre, performance, or the visual arts is required.

Notes: lab; $30. lab fee. Additional purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student.

(Fall) What Is Performance?

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Critical Social Thought 100f-03)

What's the difference between acting and being, and how does the idea of "performance" structure this difference? How do we "perform" our own identities, and how do we interpret the performances of others? This seminar offers a basic introduction to performance studies, an exciting new discipline through which everyday life, ritual behaviors, and artistic practices are studied. Perspectives from the arts, humanities, and social sciences will be explored using both textual and performative approaches. This is a speaking-, reading-, and writing-intensive class that includes innovative individual and group exercises.

Prerequisites: fy or permission of instructor

Instructors: E. Rundle

Expected enrollment: 14

THEAT-180-01 - Theatre Arts - 2011-2012

(Spring) Introduction to Technical Theatre

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course will examine the materials and techniques used in building and operating theatrical scenery. It will include prop building, rigging, and welding for the theatre. Students will learn the skills to work in the scene shop interpreting scenic designs for department productions.

Notes: lab; purchase of design supplies, materials, and theatre tickets is the responsibility of the student

Instructors: R. Mauran

Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-205-01 - Theatre Arts - 2011-2012

(Spring) Acting II

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

A continuation of techniques developed in Acting I with a greater commitment to the culture of collaboration. Concentration is on scene work with realist playwrights, contemporary masters e.g. Churchill, Shepard, Wellman and Parks and with new work by contemporary playwrights. Actor training will involve the embodiment of physical behavior, the visceral use of language, and more intermediate composition work with Viewpoints to develop and refine awareness. Practical tools explored in class are intended to offer the student greater vocal, physical, and imaginative freedom and clarity, as well as text analysis skills.

Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 105 and reference from Acting I instructor

Notes: 2 meetings (2 hours); lab; $10 lab fee.

(Spring) Topics in Performance: Scene Study - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): Topics courses offer a specific approach to performing. They may include mask characterization, physical theatre techniques, acting Shakespeare, and vocal training, among others.

Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 105 and permission of instructor

Instructors: TBA

Expected enrollment: 14

THEAT-220-01 - Theatre Arts - 2011-2012

(Fall) Topics in Design: Makeup and Hair Design

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): Various topics in theatrical design, or in related design fields, including theory, practice, and history. Subjects may include opera performance and design, costume crafts, domestic interiors, and materials and techniques. The course combines historical study with studio work.

Using basic painting and three-dimensional techniques, students will learn the fundamentals of stage makeup design and application. Included in the course are units on corrective makeup, aging techniques, realistic and fantasy character makeup, facial prosthetics, hair, and facial hair. Note: Students will be responsible for some of the cost of course materials and for the purchase of a student makeup kit.

Prerequisites: one theatre arts course and permission of instructor, preference to theatre arts majors

Notes: 1 meeting (3 hours)

Instructors: S. Conly

Expected enrollment: 12

THEAT-220-01 - Theatre Arts - 2011-2012

(Spring) Topics in Design: Design Studio - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): Various topics in theatrical design, or in related design fields, including theory, practice, and history. Subjects may include opera performance and design, costume crafts, domestic interiors, and materials and techniques. The course combines historical study with studio work.

This course will study the design motifs that were inspired by the culture, religion, and mythology of ancient Greece and Rome. We will investigate their revival and reinterpretation in the architecture, decorative arts, clothing and theatre designs of the Renaissance to the present day.

Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 122, an art (studio) course or permission of instructor

Notes: lab fee of $10. Additional purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student.

Instructors: V. James

Expected enrollment: 8

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): Various topics in theatrical design, or in related design fields, including theory, practice, and history. Subjects may include opera performance and design, costume crafts, domestic interiors, and materials and techniques. The course combines historical study with studio work.

This course examines the theory, practice, and history of theatrical sound design. The course will make use of classroom projects and the current Rooke Theatre productions to develop the students' sound designs. While sound and music for theatre will be the focus, students of film, TV, and music composition are encouraged to apply.

Prerequisites: one theatre course or permission of instructor

Instructors: B. Connelly

Expected enrollment: 12

(Spring) Topics in Theatre Studies: Queer Theory, Performance, and Public Practice

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Gender Studies 223s(01))

How are gender and sexuality constructed, rehearsed, and contested through performance? How can queer cultural production serve as a method of activist intervention in dominant culture? In this course, students are introduced to the central theories and debates in queer studies, with attention to the intersections among gender, sexuality, race, and class. Students also see, write about, and discuss performances that critically engage queer discourses. Additionally, this course asks students to put theory into practice: students stage scenes from selected plays, create original performances inspired by course readings, and experiment with other performative interventions in public culture.

(Fall) Histories of Performance I

(Critical Social Thought 252f(01))

A survey of world performance history, including: the evolution of human language and consciousness; the rise of oral, ritual, and shamanic performance; religious and civic festivals; and imperial theatre practices that position the stage at the dangerous intersection of religious worship, public taste, royal patronage, and government censure. Understanding performance as both artistic practice and social institution, this course emphasizes the role performance has played in changing audiences and as a cultural and political force in various societies. We explore not only how performances were created--in terms of design, dramaturgy, architecture, and acting--but also for whom, and why.

(Spring) Histories of Performance II

(Critical Social Thought 252)

A historical survey of dramatic texts and world performance traditions from the seventeenth to the twentieth centuries, with attention given to: the influence of print culture on early modern theatrical movements; the rise of nationalism and the creation of dramatic genres; and the effects of industry and technology on experimental modernist forms. Understanding performance as both artistic practice and social institution, this course emphasizes the role performance has played in changing audiences and as a cultural and political force. As such, we explore not only how performances are created--in terms of design, dramaturgy, architecture, and acting--but for whom, and why.

(Spring) Playwriting

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Writing-intensive; English-205)
This course offers practice in the fundamentals of dramatic structure and technique. Weekly reading assignments will examine the unique nature of writing for the theatre, nuts and bolts of format, tools of the craft, and the playwright's process from formulating a dramatic idea to rewriting. Weekly writing assignments will include scenework, adaptation, and journaling. The course will culminate in the writing of a one-act play. Each class meeting will incorporate reading student work aloud with feedback from the instructor and the class. Students will listen, critique, and develop the vocabulary to discuss plays, structure, story, and content.

THEAT-312-01 - Theatre Arts - 2011-2012

(Spring) Topics in Dramatic Literature: Religion, Magic, and the Shakespearean Stage

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement
(Speaking-intensive; English 312-01)
Religious rituals, black magic, and theatrical entertainment were linked by controversy in Shakespeare's England: were they potent acts or empty performances? How did they seduce and endanger unwitting audiences? Foregrounding the plays of Shakespeare and his contemporaries, we will explore the intersecting cultural histories of religious persecution, witchcraft trials, and movements to close down the theaters. We will consider how England's religious culture was destabilized not only by the Protestant Reformation but also by global trade and travel. Our focus will extend beyond the interpretation of simple representational allusions to grapple with the particular semiotics of theatrical performance.
Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in department beyond English 101, including English 211 or permission of instructor
Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement, meets Theatre dramatic literature requirement

(Spring) Topics in Design: Classical Revivals

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement
Preamble (for topics courses): Various topics in theatrical design, or in related design fields, including theory, practice, and history. Subjects may include opera performance and design, costume crafts, domestic interiors, and materials and techniques. The course combines historical study with studio work.

This course will study the design motifs that were inspired by the culture, religion, and mythology of ancient Greece and Rome. We will investigate their revival and reinterpretation in the architecture, decorative arts, clothing and theatre designs of the Renaissance to the present day.

Prerequisites: Theatre Arts 122, an art (studio) course or permission of instructor

Notes: lab fee of $10. Additional purchase of design supplies and materials is the responsibility of the student.

(Fall) Seminar: Performance Criticism Workshop

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This seminar immerses students in the Five College theatre scene, with opportunities for travel to regional professional theatres. By approaching live performance from a critical perspective, students rethink how they see, understand, and respond as audience members. How does the practice of theatre-going relate to public discourse? What is the social function of theatre today? Weekly readings include contemporary theatre criticism and selected plays. Each student writes a number of short reviews over the semester. In-class workshops provide opportunities for discussion and revision. Students learn the arts of editing and offering feedback to others.

Prerequisites: sr or jr with Theatre Arts 251 and 252; soph with permission of instructor

Notes: This course may be taken more than once. Purchase of theatre tickets is the responsibility of the student.

(Spring) Seminar: Wasserstein and Her World

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Gender Studies 333s(01))

This course coincides with MHC's yearlong celebration of renowned American playwright Wendy Wasserstein '71. Readings include Wasserstein's complete works, Julie Salamon's new biography Wendy and the Lost Boys, and critical essays that place Wasserstein in the context of feminist theatre practice. Students will have the opportunity to conduct archival research using the Wasserstein Papers, and will participate in numerous campus events, including the Weissman Center's playwriting symposium and guest lectures by visiting scholars and artists. As dramaturgs for the department's production of Uncommon Women, the class will create a substantial program honoring Wasserstein and her legacy.

(Spring) Seminar: Studies in American Literature: 150 Years in American Theatre

(English 345)

This course will move from April 1865, when Lincoln was assassinated in a Washington theater while laughing at a hugely successful British comedy, to the present day, when revivals of the classic American playtexts grace major theaters in London. We shall follow the emergence of a distinctively national drama, responding to British precedents initially, and more recently incorporating further diverse, even international, perspectives. Playwrights studied include Susan Glaspell, Langston Hughes, Eugene O'Neill, Edward Albee, Miguel Piñero, August Wilson, David Mamet, Suzan-Lori Parks, David Henry Hwang, Lynn Nottage, and Will Eno.

African American and African Studies

AFRAM-100-01 - African American and African Studies - 2012-2013

(Spring) First-Year Seminar: American Dreams, American Dilemmas: Race, Democracy, and Human Capability in the Twenty-First Century

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

Dreams of full citizenship in North America for the descendants of enslaved African Americans have been overdetermined by dilemmas of racial inequality and racial conflict. After nearly 400 years in "the new world," the "beloved community" remains elusive. What progress has been made? What challenges remain? Is the project of integration and racial harmony dead (and, if so, what would an autopsy reveal)? What work remains in the quest for racial, gender, and economic justice and democracy? The course has two goals: to highlight critical questions and debates around black striving, and to develop good writing and critical thinking skills.

(Fall) Introduction to African American and African Studies: Identity, Community, and Progress - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course will introduce students to topics and methodologies within the vast field of African studies. This course will attempt to disrupt the history-based, U.S.-centric model by presenting alternate texts and approaches to the study of the global/black experience. We must necessarily begin by questioning the idea, definition, and practice of blackness: what is it? How/did a unified black identity emerge from disparate people, practices, and experiences? After investigating the formation of the African diaspora, we will consider texts from the Americas, Europe, and the continent, assessing each for its historical, aesthetic, political, and cultural value.

(Writing-intensive; Politics 200)

This reading- and writing-intensive course draws upon the intellectual traditions of African American, African, and African diasporic studies in order to explore the connections and disjunctions among people of African descent. While the course pays attention to national, regional, and historical contexts, it asks this question: what do African descended people have in common and when and how are their experiences and interests different?

(Fall) African American Culture and Society - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Community-based learning course)

Reviews theory and policy research that targets durable (race, gender, and class) inequalities. How has recent policy (especially involving schools and prisons) shaped public life and private sector capacity in communities of color from 1976 to the present? What are the consequences of governing through crime and punishment? Is poor discipline a viable approach to strengthening the social fabric? Data and personal narrative will be used. Brings together Mount Holyoke students and women in the final stages of their sentences in Hampden County, who collaborate as peers in a semester-long exploration of these issues. The semester culminates with a reading and completion ceremony.

(Spring) Luminous Darkness: African American Social Thought After DuBois - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

Examines the causes of and proposed solutions to "the Negro problem" in post-Civil War American public policy. Focuses on the life, work, and legacies of DuBois. Drawing on domestic and diasporic fictional and nonfictional depictions of black life in the "DuBoisian century" the course considers different responses to his 1903 question, "How does it feel to be a problem?" Examining theories, arguments, movements and policies targeting blacks and their environment allows us to criticize black modernity, assess the changing role of black intellectuals in society, evaluate "race theory" and consider dominant and marginal attempts to analyze and overcome the "color line" in America.

(Fall) Black Feminism: Theory and Praxis - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

This course explores foundational texts of major authors along with lesser-known contributors to the black feminist movement, from the nineteenth century to the present. It also examines the various ways in which black feminist theory has been expressed in and applied to the arts and political activism, analyzing black feminist cultural criticism as it applies to music, film, fine arts, performance, and literature. Conflicts and continuities between black and white feminists, and the role of profeminist men within the movement will be considered as well.

(Spring) Sex, Love, and Gender in Contemporary African American Film - *Not offered this year/term

(Writing-intensive; Film Studies 320-01)

This course will explore the representation in film of intimate relationships among African Americans. Confronting an ongoing history of racist, sexist, and homophobic images, films produced by and featuring blacks can offer alternate interpretations of love, romance, and sexuality. Coupled with literature and theoretical readings by feminists and black cultural critics, students will consider the function of--and challenges to--intimacy in interpersonal relationships among African Americans. Directors under consideration include Spike Lee, Kasi Lemmons, Marlon Riggs, and Sanaa Hamri.

(Fall) Anthropology of Modern Japan

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

Since the mid-nineteenth century, Americans have viewed Japan as the Orient's most exotic and mysterious recess, alternately enticing and frightening in its difference. Intense economic relations and cultural exchange between Japan and the U.S. have not dispelled the image of Japanese society and culture as fundamentally different from our own. In this course, we will strive for greater understanding of shared experiences as well as historical particularities. Issues covered may vary from one semester to another, but frequently focus on work, women, minorities, and popular culture. Films and anthropological works provide ethnographic examples of some key concepts.

(Fall) Shopping and Swapping: Cultures of Consumption and Exchange

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

We shop for our food, for our clothes, for our colleges. We purchase cars, manicures, and vacations. It seems that there is little that cannot be bought or sold. But we also give and receive gifts, exchange favors, "go dutch" in restaurants, and invite friends for potlucks. This course examines exchange systems cross-culturally, in order to understand their cultural significance and social consequences. It explores how our own commodity exchange system, which appears to be no more than an efficient means of distributing goods and services, in fact contains intriguing symbolic dimensions similar to the gift exchange systems of Native North America, Melanesia, and Africa.

(Fall) Special Topics in Anthropology: Anthropology and Human Rights: Between Devil's Advocate and Rights Advocacy

This course explores anthropological approaches to human rights--a key theme of transnational politics and international law. Anthropologists have contributed to discussions on human rights since the UN Declaration and the field has provided a vibrant platform to analyze ideologies, politics, and practices surrounding human rights. We will survey an array of anthropological studies that approach human rights from the perspective of cultural relativism, contextualization, advocacy, and practice. Students will gain a critical perspective on the seemingly universal rhetoric of human rights by learning how it produces diverse effects in places such as Africa, Latin America, and the Middle East.

(Fall) Special Topics in Anthropology: Anthropology of Way-Finding and Urban Space in Japan

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

The anthropology of way-finding has focused on the cognitive problems involved when people move through space. Some have suggested that people memorize sequences of vistas, while others have argued that people abstract mental maps from their experience traveling over specific itineraries. Both approaches have in common a focus on movement through space. Meanwhile, the anthropology of place has focused on the construction of culturally meaningful places out of abstract space. Way-finding is about movement; place is about dwelling. We will explore the intersection of these two approaches, exploring the way that people navigate space and construct place in the urban environment of Tokyo.

Prerequisites: Permission of instructor. Requires application to the instructor by February 24, 2012.

Notes: This 2-credit course will explore these issues during a May 14-28, 2012 trip to Tokyo, Japan. Course/trip fee required.

(Spring) Making Class Visible

This course examines questions of social class within the Mount Holyoke community, at critical intersections with race, gender, and disability. Drawing upon readings in anthropology and film studies that critique the notion of a homogeneous "community" and offer alternative theoretical models, students will focus reflexively on three projects: the co-production of an ethnographic film, the creation of an advertising campaign for the film, creation of a website, for extending the conversation about class. Among the questions we explore at all three sites are: What is your idea of work? Where and when do you notice class? Is class a topic of conversation and/or storytelling in your family?

(Fall) Anthropology of Reproduction

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Gender Studies 333F-02)

This course covers major issues in the anthropology of reproduction, including the relationship between production and reproduction, the gendered division of labor, the state and reproductive policy, embodied metaphors of procreation and parenthood, fertility control and abortion, crosscultural reproductive ethics, and the social implications of new reproductive technologies. We examine the social construction of reproduction in a variety of cultural contexts.

Prerequisites: jr, sr; anthropology or gender studies major; plus 8 credits in department

Instructors: L. Morgan

ANTHR-310-01 - Anthropology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Visual Anthropology in the Material World

(Community-based learning course; Film Studies 320f-01)

In this course we go behind the scenes and behind the screens of anthropological films, museum exhibitions, "small media" events such as television, and publications such as National Geographic Magazine, to explore the social contexts of image production, distribution, and interpretation. Focusing on visual activism and ethics, we consider how popular portrayals of our own society and of others' both shape and are shaped by hierarchies of value in the material world. Finally, we leave the walls of the classroom to produce home movies of places which others call home - workplaces, temporary shelters, artistic environments, and so forth.

Prerequisites: Anthropology 105 and 4 additional credits in department

Instructors: D. Battaglia

ANTHR-316-01 - Anthropology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Special Topics in Anthropology: The West and the Rest: Otherization of "the Muslim" in Post-9/11 Europe and the U.S.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course traces the otherization of Muslims in Europe and the U.S. in the aftermath of September 11. The course examines the mechanisms through which dehumanizing, racial meanings are extended to designate Muslims as a coherent, timeless category associated with backwardness, violence and an urgent threat. By the end of the semester, the students will gain a critical, comparative perspective to identify and analyze some common mechanisms such as securitization, profiling, and gendering as well as tools such as stigmatization and surveillance that travel across time and space to define certain groups as "dangerous others."

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department or permission of instructor

Instructors: E. Babul

ANTHR-316-02 - Anthropology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Gender, Food, and Agriculture in the Global Context - *Not offered this year/term

(Gender Studies 333(J))

This course explores the gendered domains of food and agriculture as they unfold within household and community economies in the global south and in G-8 countries. We will examine the place of women in systems of food production, processing, marketing, and consumption. We will address locally regulated markets, cuisines, and peasant farming systems as they interface with international neo-liberal systems of market and trade. We will also pay close attention to emergent women's agricultural cooperatives and unions as they shape new transnational coalitions that offer sustainable (and flourishing) solutions to problems associated with post-industrial agriculture.

Prerequisites: jr or sr; 8 credits in gender studies or anthropology or permission of instructor

Instructors: C. Heller

(Spring) Explorations in Cultural Semantics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; English 376)

Where does meaning come from, and how does it work? Do different forms of expression (verbal, visual, auditory, or tactile) involve different ways of referring, of claiming what a message is about? Where do I locate the differences, how can I describe them? This course offers an introduction to key concepts in the study of meaning with a particular emphasis on narrative theory. We will take a closer look at the similarities and differences in the construction of "the story," in literature, history, myth, and other types of claims from very different historical (Ancient, Medieval, or Modern) and cultural (European, Aboriginal-Australian, and Native-American) settings.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 12 credits in department or permission of instructor. Introductory course in linguistics or literary criticism or equivalent is required.

(Spring) Risk

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

People in all societies face uncertainty. Yet we have taken fear of the unknown and calculations of risk to a new level. Dangers appear to confront us at every turn -- in the form of tainted food, global warming, epidemics, market collapses, and accidents at work and on roads. Terrorist attacks in New York and Tokyo, and crime in Sao Paulo, have led to the increased control of public spaces in these cities. Public spaces have been the source of both excitement and anxiety, but cultures of risk have emphasized their dangers. This course will explore some of the implications of cultures of risk.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department or permission of instructor

(Spring) Identities/Differences: Anthropological Perspectives

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement
(Community-based learning course)

This course examines notions of person and self across cultures, with specific reference to the social construction and experience of cultural identities. Discussions focus on issues of gender, race, ethnicity, and the values of individuality and relationality in different cultures.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department

Instructors: D. Battaglia

Architectural Studies

ARCH-201-01 - Architectural Studies - 2012-2013

(Spring) Introduction to the Built Environment

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course is conceived as an experiential gateway into the different fields embraced by architecture and design. Emphasizing the collaborative and interdisciplinary character of practice that engages with the built environment, the course units explore specific disciplines, such as architectural design, landscape architecture, interior architecture, urban planning, historic preservation, sustainability, or building technology. Hands-on projects involving visual documentation, design exercises, or fieldwork combine with lectures and discussion that consider the historical and critical context of design and planning.

Prerequisites: Open to first-years and sophomores

Instructors: M. Davis

Expected enrollment: 15

ARCH-205-01 - Architectural Studies - 2012-2013

(Fall) Topics in Architecture: Sculpting Space: Introduction to Architectural Design

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This studio course will be a design investigation of a particular theme in or approach to architecture and the built environment. Students will develop and apply traditional and contemporary architectural skills (sketches, plans, elevations, models, computer diagramming, and various modes of digital representation) to interdisciplinary and socially pertinent design problems. Creative and indexical study and analysis will be used to generate and foster a broad range of concepts and language to solve architectural issues involving site, construction, inhabitation, function, form, and space. Our goal is to apply creative techniques in art and sculpture to the creation of meaningful space.

Prerequisites: One semester of design or drawing is recommended

Notes: Students enrolled in this course will be responsible for some of the cost of materials in addition to the standard studio fee of $60

Instructors: T. Long

Expected enrollment: 12

ARCH-205-01 - Architectural Studies - 2012-2013

(Spring) Topics in Architecture: Introduction to Architectural Design - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This introductory studio architecture course is a rigorous series of design investigations into architecture and the built environment. Students will develop and apply traditional and contemporary architectural skills (drawings, models) to interdisciplinary and significant design problems. Creative and indexical study and analysis will be used to generate and foster a broad range of concepts and language to solve architectural issues involving site, construction, inhabitation, function, form, and space.

Prerequisites: One semester of Drawing I, design, or sculpture is recommended.

Notes: Studio fee $60.

(Fall) Topics in Architectural Studies: Issues in Sustainability: Adaptive Reuse

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Community-based learning course)

This design studio looks at regenerative design and sustainability through the lens of adaptive reuse, restoration of buildings and damaged sites. Topics include historic preservation, community revitalization strategies, urban agriculture initiatives, permaculture, and systems ecology. Students will be asked to invent new program types that reconnect people with the land, cleanse sick sites, and empower urban communities to be stewards of their future. Through this work, students realize how design can be a tool for healing. This course will involve direct contact with local community members as well as numerous field trips to local sites.

Prerequisites: exposure to "Rhinoceros" software preferred but not required

Notes: Students may be asked to purchase model making materials periodically.

Instructors: S. Brown

Expected enrollment: 16

ARCH-305-01 - Architectural Studies - 2012-2013

(Spring) Advanced Topics in Architecture: Urban Sustainability

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course studies urban space shaped by an environmentalist agenda, social equity, and economic sustenance. Urban space is understood in terms of network of spaces defined between building blocks. This emphasis on space reveals human experiences including social relations, interactions with natural settings, and economic activities. Class discussions consider criticisms of rapid urbanization, sprawl, and segregation and review recent models such as new urbanism, smart growth, landscape urbanism, and community design. Through case study assignments, students investigate design and planning strategies at scales ranging from suburbs to mill towns to metropolis.

Prerequisites: jr, sr; 8 credits in architectural studies, art history, or environmental studies

ARTH-100-01 - Art History - 2012-2013

(Fall) Image and Environment: Western Art: 1400-2000

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

An introduction to painting, sculpture, and architecture in Europe and America from the Renaissance to the present. Classes are organized around five focused topics: Renaissance Florence; the artist in the seventeenth century; art, revolution and nationhood; nineteenth-century realism; and abstraction and empathy. Lectures will be complemented by class discussion, short films, and assignments in the art museum.

Instructors: P. Staiti

Expected enrollment: 55

ARTH-100-01 - Art History - 2012-2013

(Spring) Image and Environment: Byzantine to Baroque

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course provides a broad overview of Western art and architecture from the sixth through the seventeenth centuries. We will begin with the heritage of the Roman empire in Byzantine art, continue into the Western medieval tradition including Romanesque and Gothic, then conclude with the Renaissance and Baroque periods. We will consider a wide range of objects and media--including mosaics, manuscripts, paintings, sculptures, and prints--as well as building types ranging from churches to palaces and villas. Students will come away with an understanding of the dominant trends and major figures as well as the shifting ideals that shaped creative expression for more than a millennium.

(Fall) Introductory Seminar in Art History: Early Modern Art - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar

This seminar explores the extraordinary variety of objects that commemorated love, marriage, fertility, and eroticism in fifteenth and sixteenth-century Europe. We will consider works ranging from the loftiest representations of Platonic love down to the frankly sexual, from paintings to prints to painted marriage chests, including objects that can be seen firsthand in the Mount Holyoke College Art Museum. Students will refine their skills of visual and verbal analysis, while also learning to interpret these works through the lens of social history, paying particular attention to the role of women.

(Spring) Talking Pictures: An Introduction to Film - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Film Studies 202-01)

Some of the best feature-length films of the past century have commanded our attention and imagination because of their compelling artistry and the imaginative ways they tell stories visually and verbally. This course closely studies narrative films from around the world, from the silent era to the present, and in the process it introduces students to the basic elements of film form, style, and narration. Some of the films to be considered are: Broken Blossoms, Battleship Potemkin, Citizen Kane, Contempt, The Bicycle Thief, Ugetsu, Rear Window, Woman in the Dunes, The Marriage of Maria Braun, Days of Heaven, and Moulin Rouge.

(Fall) Gods and Mortals: Myth in Ancient Art and Literature - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Classics 211)

Many ancient images tell completely different versions of myth from those portrayed in Greek and Roman literary sources. By juxtaposing distinctive modes of communication in the ancient world, students will analyze the rhetorical uses of myth, both then and now. Students will also examine the range of possibilities for translating and interpreting text and image, which will alert them to the vitality of myth as a language of its own, transcending historical parameters.

(Fall) The Hellenistic World: From Alexander to Cleopatra - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Hellenistic art has often been regarded as a chaotic, decadent phase between the golden ages of classical Greece and imperial Rome. Yet the period in the Mediterranean from the death of Alexander the Great in 323 BCE to the Roman conquest of Egypt in 31 BCE saw the creation of some of the greatest masterpieces of ancient art, the development of formal art criticism, and the mass production of art for private enjoyment. The course addresses the new themes and purposes of art in a cosmopolitan culture that, in many respects, was not unlike our own.

(Spring) Empire: The Art and Archaeology of the Roman Provinces

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

At its height, the Roman Empire spanned a vast area, from modern Scotland to Libya and Iraq. Within that territory lived peoples of multiple races, languages, and religions. This course explores the art and architecture created in this global culture from its beginning in 30 BCE to the dedication of the first Christian capital, Constantinople, in 330 CE. Subjects include propaganda, arena spectacles, the home, mystery religions, and the catacombs.

(Fall) Renaissance Art - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This survey outlines the history of painting, sculpture, architecture, and urbanism in fifteenth- and sixteenth-century Italy, a time of major artistic and cultural transformation. To trace these developments, we will take a geographic approach, focusing on cities and societies in order to understand the diverse social networks that linked artists with their patrons and publics. We will also examine the expanding networks of cross-cultural contact that linked Italian cities like Florence, Rome, and Venice to places throughout western Europe and beyond.

(Fall) Renaissance and Baroque Architecture in Italy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course focuses on architecture in Italy--including churches, palaces, villas, and fortifications, as well as city planning--from 1400 to 1680. In this period, architects took their cues from the classical tradition even as they carved out their own territory, developing new techniques and perfecting old ones to realize their designs. We will trace shifting architectural practice through key figures from Brunelleschi to Bernini, and through the lens of larger cultural forces. We will also examine buildings in light of the painted and sculpted decorative programs that were often integral to their overall effect.

(Spring) The Global Renaissance

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

The traditionalist view of the Renaissance treats Europe as if it were an isolated hotbed of cultural innovation. This course will reconsider the period as one of intensifying cross-pollination, when European artists were deeply affected by contact with the Near and Far East, Africa, and the Americas. Specific topics will include representations of distant lands and peoples; the collecting of exotic materials; cartography and expanding world horizons; Venice and the Ottoman world; and the reception of classical architecture in Latin America. We will consider many facets of Renaissance visual culture--from paintings and buildings to maps, prints, and illustrated books--that framed these global crosscurrents.

(Fall) Nineteenth-Century European Art: Neoclassicism to Impressionism

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course traces major developments in European art during the periods traditionally designated by the terms neoclassicism, romanticism, realism, and impressionism. Focusing primarily on French art, but branching out to consider the art of England and Spain, it explores the key artistic themes of the century: the engagement with history, the rise of nationhood, the experience of the urban, the Marxist proposal, the grappling with modernity, the dealing in individual temperaments. Among the major figures to be studied are Constable, Courbet, David, Delacroix, Goya, Ingres, Manet, Monet, and Renoir.

(Fall) History of Photography

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This survey course traces the rise and development of photography in the United States and, to a lesser extent, Mexico and the countries in Western Europe. It charts the wide range of work with the camera, including commercial, so-called "vernacular," and fine art projects, and considers pictures from photography's very beginnings in the mid-nineteenth century to today's practices. Among the major figures to be discussed are the early landscape photographers O'Sullivan and Watkins, the avant-garde photographers Stieglitz and Genthe, the Depression-era photographers Evans and Lange, and the so-called New Documentarians Arbus and Frank.

(Fall) Building the Modern Environment: Architecture 1890-1990

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

An exploration of major movements and personalities in architecture from the late nineteenth century to the present. Emphasizing the United States against the background of European developments, the course considers the search by architects, including Frank Lloyd Wright, Le Corbusier, and Frank Gehry, for a language of form and space that captures the contemporary spirit as it elevates society to a higher plane of existence. Discussion focuses on issues of technology and utopia, the skyscraper, and the collision of tradition, modernity, and postmodernism in architecture since 1945.

(Spring) European Art: 1885-1945 - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course examines the great ruptures in European art that today we call modernist. It relates aspects of that art to the equally great transformations in European society: revolutionary ferment, the rise and consolidation of industrial capitalism, colonization and its discontents, and world war. Among the major figures to be studied are Duchamp, Matisse, Malevich, Picasso, Seurat, and van Gogh.

(Spring) Contemporary Art: Art Since 1945 - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course traces the different paths of painting, sculpture, and photography in the United States and, less so, Western Europe since World War II. Initially, most of these paths traced a relationship with the "crisis of modernism," but increasingly, they have taken on a different vitality, drawing energy from a wide variety of postmodern and postcolonial subjects and debates: identity politics, transnationalism, diaspora. Can something that can be identified as an avant-garde practice exist in such a context? What kinds of questions are appropriate to ask about works that stridently attempt to suspend the very category of art?

(Spring) American Painting 1880-1980 - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

A study of the work of individual painters and the cultural environment in which painting was produced and viewed in America. Topics will include landscape painting, impressionism, naturalism, modernism, the machine age, the city, abstract expressionism, and pop art. Eakins, Homer, Sargent, Whistler, Cassatt, O'Keeffe, Hopper, Pollock, Johns, and Warhol are some of the artists to be discussed.

(Fall) American Art and Architecture 1620-1880

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

A survey of painting, architecture, sculpture, and design from the colonial period to the late nineteenth century, this course introduces students to period styles and building types, as well as individual painters and architects. Classes develop ways of looking at and thinking about art and objects as material expressions of American social, political, and cultural ideas. Topics will include: portraiture, colonial Boston, art and revolution, nature and nation, the West, domestic architecture, and the city of Washington. Copley, Peale, Jefferson, Stuart, Cole, and Church are some of the key figures to be studied.

(Fall) Arts of Islam: Book, Mosque, and Palace

(Asian Studies 271)

Through investigation of major works produced in the Muslim world between the seventh and seventeenth centuries from Spain to India, this course explores the ways in which art and architecture were used to embody the faith, accommodate its particular needs, and express the power of its rulers. Topics include the calligraphy of the Qur'an, illustrated literature, the architecture of the mosque, and the aristocratic palace.

Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr, or permission of instructor

(Fall) Issues in Art History: Survey of African Art: The Creation of African Art

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

What is African art? Why are so many different kinds of cultural expressions from such a large and diverse continent categorized in the same way? In this course, we emphasize artistic creation from the perspective of artists by studying works from various African cultures. We analyze the creation of African art as a subject of inspiration and research. Throughout the semester, we discuss African diasporic arts and contemporary African art. Students examine both scholarly and popular interpretations of art objects to develop skills in critical analysis and visual literacy. The course incorporates visits to on-campus resources, such as the Mount Holyoke College Art Museum.

(Spring) Issues in Art History: The Moving Image in Contemporary Art

(Film Studies 220)

This course will survey the rise of the motion picture as both subject and mode in art since 1960. The development of video art, from monitor and installation to projection and flat screen, opened up new channels for performance and sculpture. But the rising presence of 16mm film in galleries (Tacita Dean) as celluloid disappears from movie theaters amplifies a trend that also includes artists as feature filmmakers (Julian Schnabel and Cindy Sherman), Christian Marclay's use of cinema's past in The Clock (2010), and Matthew Barney's reliance on the Guggenheim as set and cinematheque.

(Spring) Issues in Art History: American Modernisms, 1900-1929 - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course explores the diversity of modern art in early twentieth-century America. As new technologies and ideologies transformed the political, economic, and social fabric of the country, changes in the arts were equally rapid and as dramatic. The course examines the competing and often conflicting ideas and styles of the American avant-garde against the background of more conservative movements of the era. Robert Henri, Georgia O'Keeffe, Man Ray, Charles Demuth, and Edward Hopper are among the artists to be discussed.

(Fall) Issues in Art History: Egyptian Art and Egyptomania - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Why do we need the past, and how do we engage with it? In ancient Egypt, the past had power, and patrons, sculptors, and builders drew from earlier generations for inspiration. In the modern West, ancient Egypt holds a unique fascination. Recurring waves of artists and architects have taken up Egyptian motifs for their own sensibilities. The course examines ancient monuments and visual motifs in their original context as well as their appropriation in subsequent centuries, including our own.

Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr, or permission of instructor

(Fall) Issues in Art History: Storytelling in Ancient Art - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

The aim of the course is to acquaint students with visual modes of storytelling in the predominantly oral cultures of ancient Greece and Rome. Myths and legends appear in a range of media (sculpture, mosaic, fresco, lamps, and gems) and contexts (domestic, sacred, political). Which stories were represented and what do we know about their reception among ancient viewers? Original objects in the Mount Holyoke College Art Museum will offer case studies.

(Spring) Issues in Art History: Ancient Painting and Mosaic - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

The course treats the themes, techniques, and contexts of painting and mosaic in the ancient Mediterranean. From Bronze Age palaces to early Byzantine churches, surfaces were embellished with frescoes, pebbles, glass and jewels. These might be rendered in complex geometric shapes or with mythological scenes. Portable vases displayed elegantly drawn figures. We will examine the unique effects of each medium and how they influenced and interacted with each other.

(Fall) Issues in Art History: Introduction to Classical Archaeology - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course has two aims: to introduce the various methods and disciplines that make up the field of classical archaeology, and to acquaint students with some of the major sites and artifacts of ancient Greece and Rome. Classes and assignments will involve work with original artifacts and case studies of such sites as Troy, Olympia, and Pompeii. Issues of conservation and cultural property will be discussed.

Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr, or permission of instructor

Instructors: B. Bergmann

ARTH-300-01 - Art History - 2012-2013

(Fall) Critical Approaches to Art Historical Study

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Intended primarily for art history majors, this course introduces key research tools and scholarly methods in the field. Through intensive readings, discussions, presentations, and written work, students will hone their analytical and communication skills. We will learn to navigate libraries and digital resources, to read with a critical eye, and to write persuasive prose. We will become acquainted with interpretive approaches ranging from formalism to Marxism to post-colonialism. Students will also be exposed to a variety of professions that demonstrate how the art historical skills they acquire as undergraduates can translate into life after college—in the art world and beyond.

Prerequisites: jr, sr., 8 credits in department

Instructors: J. Maier

Expected enrollment: 15

(Spring) Topics in Art History: Current Issues in Latin American Art - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course highlights recent scholarship and criticism written in and about Latin America, focusing upon visual culture from 1520 to the present. Among the works we consider: colonial paintings and urban planning, representations of Frida Kahlo and Karl Marx, Brazilian film, contemporary photography, and museum exhibitions. Of particular interest will be the theoretical and methodological issues that characterize writing on visual culture from the 1990s to the present, and the ways they challenge our response to the question "What is Latin American art?"

Prerequisites: at least one 200-level course in art history or one 200-level course in Latin American anthropology, government, history, film or literature. Reading knowledge of Spanish useful, but not required.

(Spring) Seminar in Ancient Art: The Unearthed Cities of Vesuvius

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Life on the Bay of Naples came to an abrupt halt in 79, when Vesuvius erupted, preserving surrounding cities and villas with lava and ash. The rediscovery of Pompeii and Herculaneum since the eighteenth century had significant impact upon European art and literature. The seminar examines the surviving environment and artifacts created to Roman tastes in the late republic and early empire. It considers the history of archaeological and art historical methods and the romantic visions of art, theatre, and film up to the present.

Prerequisites: courses in art history, classics, or ancient history or per permission of instructor.

Instructors: B. Bergmann

(Fall) Seminar in Medieval Art: Chartres Cathedral - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This seminar will explore Chartres Cathedral, its architectural history, its vast programs of sculpture, and its stained glass narratives. The church and its imagery, which took shape between ca. 1140 and 1250, offer a view back in time to medieval religious beliefs and practices, social dynamics, architectural technology, and fashion. We will also consider how differing views of the cathedral--as a popular communal creation or as the embodiment of an oppressive elite--reflect modern interpretive perspectives.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in art history or medieval studies

Instructors: M. Davis

(Fall) Seminar in Baroque Art: Gianlorenzo Bernini: Practices, Works, Ideas - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course examines the painting, sculpture, and architecture produced by the seventeenth century's most influential multimedia artist. It puts Bernini's innovations in the context of the political, religious, and artistic debates of his day, closely examining the Roman society that Bernini dominated during the reigns of three different popes, as well as the France of Louis XIV where Bernini briefly lived and worked. Topics include: workshop practices and preparatory works; ephemeral creations (festive and theatrical); antiquity and modern invention; the aesthetic of marvel; the myth of the artist; and the legacy of Bernini's "bel composto."

(Spring) Seminar in Baroque Art: Art and Architecture of Rome - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Rome was--and remains--a most complex and magnetic city, one that has endured and become "eternal" through countless transformations to its urban and artistic fabric. The focus of this seminar is a particularly intense period of change in Rome--when artists, architects, and intellectuals flocked to the city, bringing traditions from elsewhere that mixed freely with the work of others, while responding to what was already present. More than a survey of famous works in Rome, this course aims to conjure some of the excitement of a city that considered itself the most fashionable and vibrant place in the world.

Prerequisites: jr, sr; 8 credits in art history or permission of instructor

(Spring) Seminar in Twentieth-Century Art: Shudders!: Photography Goes Public - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This seminar will explore the explosion of photography in 1930s America. The decade's photography is often epitomized by the heartrending images of the Great Depression, of social concern, of the traumas experienced by the poor and displaced. But in fact the period also witnessed photography's extraordinary vitality and new visibility, in the colorful pages of Life magazine and the tabloids, on the walls of MOMA, in experimental photobooks, at Photo League exhibitions, and much more. Among the major figures to be studied are photographers as diverse as Walker Evans, Weegee, and Aaron Siskind.

(Spring) Seminar in Asian Art: "Through 'Indian' Eyes: Photography in India"

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Explores the way photography seized hold of the imagination in India. Nineteenth-century documentary photographs of Indian ruins memorialized the reach of the British Empire when used for dioramas, panoramas, and magic lantern shows on the streets of London. By the twentieth century, manipulated photographs and mechanically reproduced "photos" of Indian gods complicated photography's claim to truth. Students will debate scholarly views and develop research projects to examine photography's imaginative uses in India.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course explores the various technical and conceptual aspects of drawing that are specific to portraying the human form. Students will work largely from the figure and examine their drawings within the context of other historical figurative work. Students will pay special attention to the drawings of the Cubists, De Kooning and Richard Diebenkorn. Students will mainly produce drawings, complete several readings and present the work of a contemporary artist working with the figure. While this class does not have a pre-requisite, it will demand that you work rigorously during class sessions and on out-of-class assignments.

(Spring) Japanese Papermaking

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

In this course, students learn the traditional practice and history of Japanese hand papermaking, while exploring contemporary applications of the method. Thin, translucent, strong paper is great for drawing and printmaking, as well as sculptural construction and paper casting. This fluidity of medium naturally encourages students to become interdisciplinary in their art making. The apparent fragility, structural strength, and surprising longevity of the material provides a foundation for philosophical investigations into the nature of creativity.

(Fall) First Year Sanskrit I

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement; does not meet a distribution requirement

Introduction to Sanskrit, the classical language of India. Related to other Indo-European languages (including English) and the ancestor of most of the sixteen major Indian languages (e.g., Hindi), Sanskrit is the medium of the literary classics, and of the texts of the Hindu, Buddhist, and Jain religions. This first-semester course covers Sanskrit grammar. The emphasis is on sentence construction, recognition and production of grammatical forms, and translation. Attention is also given to script, chanting, and pronunciation. The goal is proficiency in reading sentences and sustained passages in Sanskrit, in preparation for reading authentic texts in the second semester.

Notes: Students with previous language study should contact Ms. Peterson for placement. Students must complete both Asian Studies 141 and 142 to satisfy the College language requirement.

(Taught in English; Gender Studies 204-03, Theatre Arts 234-01)

Yue Opera, an all-female art that flourished in Shanghai in 1923, resulted from China's social changes and the women's movement. Combining traditional with modern forms and Chinese with Western cultures, Yue Opera today attracts loyal and enthusiastic audiences despite pop arts crazes. We will focus on how audiences, particularly women, are fascinated by gender renegotiations as well as by the all-female cast. The class will read and watch classics of this theater, including Dream of the Red Chamber, Story of the Western Chamber, Peony Pavilion, and Butterfly Lovers. Students will also learn the basics of traditional Chinese opera.

(Spring) Stories and Storytelling in India and the World

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English)

India is a treasure-house of tales, and the home of vibrant traditions of oral and written storytelling in classical Sanskrit and in modern languages.

Indian tales have travelled around the world and have parallels and versions in The Arabian Nights, Decameron, and Canterbury Tales. Indian epics and myths are related to those of the Greeks. We will study the epic Ramayana, myths of Hindu gods, animal fables (Panchatantra), women's stories, and folktales in various forms, puppet plays, song, and dramatic performance. We will examine who tells stories, why and when, and compare Indian stories with tales from elsewhere, e.g., Aesop, Grimm, Homer.

(Spring) Survey of the Universe with Lab

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

Discover how the forces of nature shape our understanding of the cosmos. Explore the origin, structure, and evolution of the earth, moons and planets, comets and asteroids, the sun and other stars, star clusters, the Milky Way and other galaxies, clusters of galaxies, and the universe as a whole. In lab, learn the constellations and how to use the telescopes. Use them to observe celestial objects, including the moon, the sun, the planets, nebulae, and galaxies. Learn celestial coordinate and timekeeping systems. Find out how telescopes work.

Notes: Designed for non-science majors. The lecture for this course meets at the same time as the lecture for ASTR-100-01, but the lab is also required for this course so it satisfies group II-B requirement.

(Fall) Mars: Missions, Conditions, and Prospects for Habitation - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Exploration of Mars is a goal of the current U.S. president and a dream of many citizens. We will examine what needs to be done before anyone sets foot on the Red Planet. We will consider the history and politics behind Martian exploration, our knowledge of geology and atmospheric conditions on Mars based on data from current missions, and plans for future exploration.

(Fall) Introduction to Astronomy: Survey of the Universe - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

A comprehensive introduction to the study of modern astronomy that explores the celestial bodies that inhabit the universe--planets, stars, and galaxies- and examines the universe itself--its origin, structure, and ultimate destiny.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 100 or 101 or the equivalent

Notes: The lecture for this course meets at the same time as the lecture for ASTR-100 and 101. Students in this course (110) must attend a weekly 4th hour section.

(Spring) Introduction to Astronomy: Survey of the Universe with Coffee Table Astrophysics - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

In addition to attending the Astronomy 100 lectures, students will take part in a 4th hour in which we will discuss current frontiers in modern astronomy and astrophysics. Although this 4th hour is somewhat tailored to the interests of the enrolled students, anticipated topics include Einstein's Theories of Relativity, Death of Massive Stars, Black Holes and Warped Spacetime, and the Expanding Universe. Using readings and discussion we will examine the nature of these mind-boggling discoveries and their treatment in the popular media.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 100 or 101 or the equivalent

ASTR-223-01 - Astronomy - 2012-2013

(Spring) Planetary Science

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

This intermediate-level course covers fundamentals of spectroscopy, remote sensing, and planetary surfaces. Discussions will include interiors, atmospheres, compositions, origins, and evolution of terrestrial planets; satellites, asteroids, comets, and planetary rings.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 100/101 and one semester of a physical science course

Instructors: C. Fassett

Expected enrollment: 40

ASTR-228-01 - Astronomy - 2012-2013

(Spring) Astrophysics I: Stars and Galaxies

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

A calculus-based introduction to the properties, structure, formation, and evolution of stars and galaxies. The laws of gravity, thermal physics, and atomic physics provide a basis for understanding observed properties of stars, interstellar gas, and dust. We apply these concepts to develop an understanding of stellar atmospheres, interiors, and evolution, the interstellar medium, and the Milky Way and other galaxies.

(Fall) Seminar: Topics in Astrophysics: Mars

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Exploration of several unresolved questions about the Red Planet, such as 1) Where was the water on Mars and where did it go? How well will future missions answer this question? 2) How has the Martian atmosphere evolved over time? 3) What rock types are present on the Martian surface based on meteorite studies vs. direct observation? 4) How can geomorphic features of Mars best be interpreted, and what do they tell us about the evolution of the planet? and 5) Was there life on Mars at any time? Is there life on Mars at present, and if so, where? An interactive seminar with students and faculty reading current papers from the literature as well as daily reports from current mission websites.

Prerequisites: any intermediate-level astronomy or geology course; AST 223 recommended

Instructors: D. Dyar
Expected enrollment: 16

ASTR-330-02 - Astronomy - 2012-2013

(Fall) Seminar: Topics in Astrophysics: Moon - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course will survey the past, present, and future of lunar exploration and science. We will focus on the evolution of the Moon as a paradigm for terrestrial planets, with specific units on interiors, heat flow, thermal evolution, magnetism, volcanism, volatiles, impacts, crustal composition and mineralogy, regoliths, and spectroscopy of its surface. This is a discussion-based, interactive seminar with students and faculty reading current papers from the literature.

(Writing-intensive)

Are we alone in the universe? The essence of that question has likely been a source of inspiration since the dawn of humanity. We will look at the history of extraterrestrial debate and analyze the transdisciplinary science behind astrobiology. We will investigate the properties of life as we know it and extrapolate their properties to consider the potential for simple life forms to exist on Mars and elsewhere in our solar system, to the possibility of intelligent life on habitable planets near distant stars, and finally the implications of extraterrestrial life to life on Earth. Assessments will include critical reading and writing about scientific literature on this topic.

(Fall) Protein Biochemistry and Cellular Metabolism

(Biological Sciences 311f, Chemistry 311f)

This course is a rigorous introduction to the study of protein molecules and their role as catalysts in the cell. Topics include general principles of protein folding, protein structure-function correlation, enzyme kinetics and mechanism, carbohydrate and lipid biochemistry, and metabolic pathways (catabolic and anabolic) and their interaction and cross-regulation. Biological transformation of energy is considered in light of the principles of thermodynamics.

(Spring) Nucleic Acids Biochemistry and Molecular Biology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement
(Biological Sciences 314s, Chemistry 314s)

This course is an in-depth examination of DNA and RNA structures and how these structures support their respective functions during replication, transcription, and translation of the genetic material. Emphasis is on the detailed mechanisms associated with each step of gene expression. Discussions incorporate many recent advances brought about by recombinant DNA technology.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210, Chemistry 302 (can be taken concurrently)

BIOCH-330-01 - Biochemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Topics in Biochemistry and Molecular Biology - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course each year examines a number of important and exciting topics in biochemistry, molecular biology, and other related fields of biology. The intellectual and research development that formulated these fundamental concepts is traced through extensive readings of the primary literature. Discussions emphasize the critical evaluation of experimental techniques, data analysis, and interpretation. Substantial student participation in the form of oral presentation is expected.

BIOL-145-01 - Biological Sciences - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introductory Biology: Nature Harmoniously Confused

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

Most organisms are notably unlike ourselves--a tapestry of bacteria, protozoans, algae, and, off by themselves, the plants, fungi, and other animals. We will survey the whole range of organisms, especially those in the ponds and forests of our campus. Labs will start in the field, offering many opportunities for wet or muddy work. The class is addressed to students intrigued by natural history; it might be useful for students interested in further study of the environment.

(Spring) Introductory Biology: Animal Bodies, Animal Functions

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

How are animal bodies built to deal with living on earth? In this course we will study the function of cells, organs, and organ systems that have evolved to help animals make their way through the physical and chemical environment. In lecture and in lab, we will consider the common needs of animals -- needs such as feeding, breathing, and reproducing -- and the diverse solutions they have devised. A range of life, from unicellular organisms to animals with backbones (including mammals), will be considered.

Prerequisites: first years will have priority during the first week of registration; upperclass students will be eligible to register for any remaining seats thereafter.

(Spring) Introductory Biology: Organismal Biology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course will cover a range of topics, from the molecular to the organismal level, related to the biochemistry and physiology of vertebrates. In particular, we will study the chemical underpinnings and functional workings of mammalian body systems (such as, endocrine, reproductive, metabolic, immunologic, neurologic, etc.), while paying attention to the ways in which these systems interact with one another and how evolution has shaped these processes. These topics will be covered through a lens that highlights the scientific research that led to our current understanding of these systems.

(Fall) Introductory Biology: Diversity of Life Evolution, cells and organisms: the roots of biological diversity

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

Life was once very simple: single cells eating and being eaten. Things have gotten complicated. Diverse habitats have selected for a staggering variety of organisms. In this course we will explore some of the organisms that inhabit the earth's myriad niches. Our examination will encompass adaptations at the cellular and organismic level, taking particular note of the symbiotic interactions that make life possible for many organisms. Throughout the semester we will discuss how researchers expand what is known by examining questions and data. You will also spend time in the laboratory honing your own questions and observation skills.

This course encompasses a broad range of concepts central to our understanding of how organisms function and evolve. We will investigate important biological processes, such as photosynthesis and metabolism, and of systems, such as the cardiovascular and immune systems. We will also take a holistic view of biology and use our newly acquired knowledge to explore such diverse topics as: the evolution of infectious diseases, the consequences of development and design on the evolution of organisms, and how the physiology and behavior of animals might affect their responses to global climate change.

(Fall) Introductory Biology: A Green World - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

First-year seminar

This course examines the plant life in the woods and fields around us, the exotic plants in our greenhouses, and the plants we depend on for food. We will study plants living in surprising circumstances, settling into winter, escaping from gardens, reclaiming farmland, cooperating with fungi and insects, and fighting for their lives. We will find that plants challenge some conventional, animal-based assumptions about what matters to living things. In labs, students will seek to answer their questions about how plants grow in nature, by studying plant structure and function, ecology, and evolution.

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

The Human Genome Project is leading to great advances in our understanding of the human body and in our ability to manipulate our own genetic information. We will focus on the science behind the Human Genome Project, and the ways in which it will change our lives. This course will also serve as a general introductory biology course for biology majors as well as nonmajors. We will read articles and books, and make use of the World Wide Web.

(Fall) Integrated Introduction to Biology and Chemistry

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This 8-credit course serves as a gateway to both the biology and chemistry core curricula. The course introduces and develops fundamental concepts in chemistry while also exploring the diverse range of strategies adopted by living systems to survive in different environments. This course prepares students for further study in chemistry (Chemistry 201) and/or biology (Biology 200). Students must register for both Biology 160 and Chemistry 160 as well as a single lab section (listed under Chemistry 160L). Recommended for students interested in completing pre-health requirements or advanced study in biochemistry or neuroscience.

Prerequisites: fy

Notes: Students must co-enroll in Biology 160 and Chemistry 160 for a total of 8 credits; three 50 minute lectures, three 75 minute lectures, and one three-hour laboratory per week.

BIOL-220-01 - Biological Sciences - 2012-2013

(Spring) Cell Biology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

The aim of this course is to understand the fundamental unit of life--the cell--at the molecular level. We will consider the assembly and structure of cellular membranes, organelles, and the cytoskeleton, as well as their roles in cellular processes including the capture and transformation of energy, catalysis, protein sorting, motility, signal transduction, and cell-cell communication. Emphasis will be placed upon the diversity of cellular form and function and the cell biological basis for disease. The laboratory portion of this course will illustrate and analyze these phenomena through selected biochemical, genetic, and microscopy-based approaches.

(Spring) Controversies in Public Health

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Philosophy 265)

This course takes an interdisciplinary approach to the discussion of public health issues. The class will be co-led by a philosopher and a biologist, with additional guest experts offering a variety of disciplinary and professional perspectives on some of the most complex and vexing current public health issues. Topics may include: the hazards and benefits of vaccination programs; effective responses to and prevention of natural disasters; obesity, food policy, nutrition, and health; the controversy over hygiene and the rise of allergic and chronic diseases; or the impact of public policy and ethics on reproductive rights. Selected topics will be scrutinized through both a biological and a philosophical lens, with the intersections and divergence of those perspectives highlighted.

Prerequisites: most seats will be reserved for sophomores

Notes: Some attendance at college speaking events will be required.

(Spring) Regenerative Medicine: Biology and Bioethics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking-intensive)

What is regenerative medicine? What is the science that drives new medical therapies using stem cells? We will study the biology of adult, embryonic, and induced pluripotent stem cells, as well as the legal, ethical, and moral implications of using these cells in medical therapies. Each member of the class will participate in a staged debate on these issues for an introductory biology class. Pending funding, we may travel to Washington, D.C. to attend a meeting of the Commission on Bioethics.

(Fall) Molecular Evolution - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course examines the dynamics of evolutionary change at the molecular level, the effects of various molecular mechanisms on the structure and function of genes and genomes, and the methodology involved in dealing with molecular data from an evolutionary perspective. Lab work will be devoted to learning ways to analyze DNA sequence data and to create and evaluate trees that use molecular data.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 and 226

BIOL-303-01 - Biological Sciences - 2012-2013

(Fall) Microbial Genetics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking-intensive)

Studies at the molecular level of various aspects of genetics, as expressed in bacterial and viral systems. Topics include patterns and mechanisms of replication, recombination, repair, and mutation of DNA; regulation of gene activity; gene-protein relationships; and genetic engineering. The fourth hour will follow a "journal club" format with student presentations.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210, and either 220 or 311

Instructors: J. Knight

Expected enrollment: 12

(Fall) Cellular and Molecular Aspects of Development - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

(Speaking-intensive)

Examines the roles of cellular movement and cellular interaction in the development of multicellular organisms. Topics include cell recognition and adhesion during morphogenesis, the importance of extracellular matrices, and current theories of embryonic pattern formation. Self-designed laboratories include techniques such as microsurgery and time-lapse video microscopy using a wide variety of embryos and cell types.

(Spring) Darwin

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Writing-intensive; History 361s(01))

This course looks at the scientific content and intellectual context of Darwin's theory of evolution - his facts, metaphors, hypotheses, and philosophical assumptions. Readings from Darwin and his sources, and examination of the organisms he studied. A background in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century history or whole organism biology is recommended.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 226 or 12 credits in history

Instructors: S. Rachootin

Expected enrollment: 12

(Fall) Invertebrate Zoology - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course looks at the evolutionary relations of the profoundly different groups of animals in light of their structure, development, and fossil history. Emphasizes exceptional organisms that prove - and disprove - biological rules. Themes include coloniality, asexual reproduction, metamorphosis, and making skeletons.

(Spring) Nucleic Acids Biochemistry and Molecular Biology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

(Biochemistry 314s, Chemistry 314s)

This course is an in-depth examination of DNA and RNA structures and how these structures support their respective functions during replication, transcription, and translation of the genetic material. Emphasis is on the detailed mechanisms associated with each step of gene expression. Discussions incorporate many recent advances brought about by recombinant DNA technology.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210, Chemistry 302, Biochemistry 311, or permission of instructor

(Spring) Behavioral Ecology - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

(Writing-intensive)

In this course, students learn to view and understand animal behavior within an evolutionary context. The mechanistic side of behavior is investigated and students explore how behavioral traits originate and evolve over time. Students will integrate their knowledge of how organisms work with an appreciation of why they work the way they do. At the end of the course, students will understand basic concepts in behavioral biology and know many of the experiments that have facilitated our understanding of this field. They will be able to construct hypotheses and design experiments that address behavioral phenomena. The laboratory portion of this course is based on individual projects.

(Fall) Scanning Electron Microscopy - *Not offered this year/term

(Geology 316f)

Includes theory and operation of the scanning electron microscope and preparation of biological and geological materials for observation. The versatile use of the microscope will be emphasized and will include low magnification, high resolution, and back scattered (reflected) electron modes of operation as well as operation at different pressures. Energy dispersive X-ray microanalysis will be introduced.

Prerequisites: 4 credits of biological sciences or geology course at the 200 level.

BIOL-317-01 - Biological Sciences - 2012-2013

(Fall) Immunology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

This course will cover the cells, organs, and biochemical signals that constitute the immune system, as well as mechanisms for the identification and removal of foreign pathogens. Additional topics may include: autoimmunity, allergy, vaccination, transplantation, cancer, immune deficiency, and pathogen evasion strategies. Emphasis will be placed on the human immune response, with the use of clinical case studies to reinforce these ideas, although experimental models will also be discussed. In the final section of the course, students will research and deliver an oral presentation on an immunology topic of interest.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 and 220

Notes: The lecture for this course meets at the same time as the lecture for Biology 319 but this course does not include a lab.

(Spring) Aquatic Biology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

(Writing-intensive)

In this course, we will focus on marine coastal and open ocean habitats as well as freshwater systems, including lakes, ponds, rivers, creeks, and wetlands. For oceans, we will explore such topics as currents, the interaction of climate and oceans, nutrient cycling and ecosystems. Our study of freshwater systems will focus on cycles, water chemistry and flora and fauna of local freshwater habitats.

(Fall) Immunology with Laboratory

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course will cover the cells, organs, and biochemical signals that constitute the immune system, as well as mechanisms for the identification and removal of foreign pathogens. Additional topics may include: autoimmunity, allergy, vaccination, transplantation, cancer, immune deficiency, and pathogen evasion strategies. Emphasis will be placed on the human immune response, with use of clinical case studies to reinforce these ideas, although experimental models will also be discussed. The laboratory portion will include experience with basic immunology techniques, followed by an extensive six-week independent project that culminates in a final research paper.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 and 220

Notes: The lecture for this course meets at the same time as Biology 317, but this course includes a laboratory.

(Fall) Introduction to Transmission Electron Microscopy - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Basic principles of transmission electron microscopy (TEM) and potential uses in biological studies. Each student selects a project and learns the fundamentals of specimen preparation, operation of the TEM, and image acquisition. Preparation, assessment and interpretation of the resulting electron micrographs culminate in an individual portfolio. Students wishing to extend their experience in other courses, including Biological Sciences 295 and 395, may enroll in this course concurrently.

(Fall) Conference Course: Art, Music, and the Brain

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics from areas emphasized in the department according to needs of particular students. Study in small groups or by individuals.

Art and music are a part of all human cultures. Is there something about the human brain that drives us to paint and sing? We will examine how the brain simultaneously processes different aspects of a visual object, such as shape, color, and depth, and ask how this processing may affect the way we draw and paint. We will ask whether musical dissonance and consonance are biologically or culturally determined and whether or not different parts of the brain process different aspects of music such as pitch, melody, harmony, rhythm, and the emotional content of a musical piece.

Prerequisites: seniors with at least 8 credits at the 200 level in biology, neuroscience and behavior, studio art, art history, or music

Notes: students studying art and music are encouraged to enroll

(Fall) Conference Course: How to Think Like a Plant: Ecological Context for Plant Structure and Function

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics from areas emphasized in the department according to needs of particular students. Study in small groups or by individuals.

This course will provide ecological context for plant structure and function emphasizing whole organisms in their (past present & future) natural environments. What plants are made of - organs, tissues, cells, organelles - and what those parts do - grow, respond, reproduce, senesce - represent integrated solutions to a highly complex physical and biotic world. Why these plants here, now? How do structure and function shape the development and stratification of plant communities in space and time? Expect immersion in botanical language, serving both descriptive and aspirational - try to think like a plant! - purposes.

BIOL-321-C - Biological Sciences - 2012-2013

(Spring) Conference Course: Marine Conservation Biology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics from areas emphasized in the department according to needs of particular students. Study in small groups or by individuals.

This seminar is based entirely on published research related to issues in marine conservation biology. It will introduce students to the latest research by leading scientists in ocean science and is highly relevant to current pressing concerns about global environmental change. The focus on primary literature and student-led discussions will help students improve their abilities to read, analyze and discuss primary literature. Those progressing to graduate school in the next year or two will feel more confident in delving into the literature surrounding their research interests and in discussing published findings and current ideas with colleagues.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 223 or 226

(Fall) Conference Course: Extreme Life - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics from areas emphasized in the department according to needs of particular students. Study in small groups or by individuals.

This course will focus on biological systems that push the limits of structural and physiological possibility. For example, midges flap their wings at up to 1000 Hz; bar-headed geese migrate over Mount Everest; deep-sea fish withstand pressures near 300 atmospheres; certain frogs can allow their body temperatures to drop below 0 degrees C. Through readings and discussions we will explore the diverse mechanisms that underlie how organisms reach extreme levels of performance and survive in extreme environments.

BIOL-321-F - Biological Sciences - 2012-2013

(Spring) Conference Course: Molecular Physiology of the Cell

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics from areas emphasized in the department according to needs of particular students. Study in small groups or by individuals.

DNA and protein are just part of what makes a cell alive; without the compartments, membranes and chemical gradients of the cell they could do nothing. In this course we will explore the ways molecular biology informs our understanding of cell physiology. The course will include in-depth discussions of protein trafficking, membrane transport, cell motility, membrane potential and respiration. We will also examine how the cell reacts when things go wrong: disorders and disease. We will use the primary research literature for much of our studies, and will analyze the data that have generated the textbook view of the cell.

(Spring) Conference Course: Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome Seminar - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics from areas emphasized in the department according to needs of particular students. Study in small groups or by individuals.

What is our current understanding of HIV-induced AIDS? What factors favor disease progression or resistance? Are there new therapies or vaccines in the pipeline? In this course, the primary literature will be used as a foundation for discussing the global picture on AIDS and current research. As a group we will discuss the science behind this immune deficiency causing virus, therapies, research priorities and new vaccine strategies. We will also touch on the social, economic and political situations that influence rates of HIV infection and disease progression. Students will be expected to work in small groups to present background material and original research.

(Spring) Conference Course: Neuroplasticity, Recovery, and Rehabilitation

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics from areas emphasized in the department according to needs of particular students. Study in small groups or by individuals.

In the past decade, neuroscientists have recognized that the adult brain is considerably more plastic and adaptable than previously thought. However neuroplasticity alone may not be enough to promote recovery following an injury or disorder. This plasticity must be harnessed through effective treatments, training, and therapies. Through classroom demonstrations, examination of the scientific literature, and discussion of case histories, we will explore neuroplasticity and rehabilitation from the level of neurons and synapses to that of the whole person.

(Spring) Comparative Biomechanics

(Physics 222)

The main objective of this course is to explore organismal structure and function via an examination of the basic physical principles that guide how living things are constructed and how organisms interact with their environment. We will use the combined approaches of the biologist and engineer to study the impact of size on biological systems, address the implications of solid and fluid mechanics for animal design, survey different modes of animal locomotion, and learn how biologists working in diverse areas (e.g., ecology, development, evolution, and physiology) gain insight through biomechanical analyses.

(Spring) First-Year Seminar: Forensic Science

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course will offer an introduction to the science in forensic investigations. We will explore several methods and instruments often used in CSI programs, such as mass spectrometry, infrared spectroscopy and DNA analysis, which are very valuable in evaluating crime scene evidence. We will explore the validity of scientific findings and the political implications of the use and availability of the data. Students will have a chance to be expert witnesses and be in the lab evaluating evidence. Analytical thinking and processing information in chemistry, biology, and other sciences will be emphasized, as well as oral and written communication skills. Short labs are planned.

CHEM-201-03 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) General Chemistry II - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course provides background in basic principles of physical, analytical, and inorganic chemistry essential to the study of all chemical phenomena. Topics include elementary principles of molecular electronic structure, quantitative treatment of chemical equilibrium with applications to solubility, acid-base, and electron transfer reactions, introduction to chemical kinetics and thermodynamics, and the chemistry of coordination compounds. Laboratory experiments will include classical analytical and kinetic techniques, preparation of inorganic compounds, and an introduction to ab initio electronic structure calculations.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 101 with grade of C or better, or permission of instructor

Instructors: D. Cotter

CHEM-202-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Fall) Organic Chemistry I

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

Introduces organic chemistry, emphasizing the principles governing broad classes of reactions. Topics include stereochemistry, nucleophilic substitution and elimination reactions, the chemistry of alkanes, alkenes, alkynes, alcohols, and ethers, and an introduction to infrared and nuclear magnetic resonance spectroscopy. Laboratory work includes synthesis, practice in the techniques of distillation, crystallization, chromatography, molecular modeling, and identifying unknown organic compounds by chemical and spectroscopic means.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 201 with grade of C or better, or permission of instructor

Instructors: D. Hamilton

Section Instructors: 01 LAB The department | 02 LAB The department | 03 LAB The department | 04 LAB The department |

(Spring) Chemistry of Biomolecules - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

An examination of the major ideas of biochemistry from the point of view of the chemical sciences rather than the life sciences. Structures of important biomolecules. The role of energetics and reaction dynamics in biochemical processes. Major metabolic pathways are considered, including those of proteins, carbohydrates, lipids, and nucleic acids.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 202

Notes: This course is not intended for Biochemistry majors, who must complete Biochemistry 311f and 314s. First priority will be given to sophomores and juniors.

Instructors: M. Nunez

CHEM-250-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Introduction to the History of Chemistry - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

(Writing-intensive)

Traces the growth of chemistry in several ways: as a body of knowledge and beliefs, as a practical means of intervention, and as a community of practitioners linked (or divided) by sociopolitical bonds and common interests, intellectual and otherwise. After an overview of chemical history and an introduction to various scholarly traditions in the field, the balance of the course will be devoted to case studies of narrower topics or episodes, such as the alchemical tradition and Robert Boyle, the eighteenth-century Chemical Revolution, nineteenth-century organic chemistry, Ionism, atomism and elementalism, chemistry and war, the quantum revolution, educational traditions, the role of women.

CHEM-302-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Organic Chemistry II

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

A continuation of Chemistry 202 that addresses the chemistry of aromatic compounds, the carbonyl group, and a number of other functional groups. Examples drawn from compounds of biological interest. The laboratory includes organic synthesis and the identification of unknown compounds by chemical and spectroscopic means.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 202 with grade of C or better

CHEM-304-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Advanced Organic Chemistry Laboratory

Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This half-semester course, starting after spring break, applies and builds upon the techniques and tools of synthetic organic chemistry acquired during previous laboratory classes. Experiments will be selected to provide exposure to contemporary synthetic methods, to offer examples of the application of sophisticated reagents, to afford practice in modern separation and purification approaches, and provide scope for hands-on acquisition of Nuclear Magnetic Resonance (NMR) spectra.

Prerequisites: Permission of instructor and Chemistry 302 as prerequisite or co-requisite

Notes: second half of semester

Instructors: D. Hamilton, A. Figueiredo

Section Instructors: 01 LAB | 02 LAB | 03 LAB |

Expected enrollment: 20

CHEM-306-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Methods of Measurement - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

We will discuss analytical techniques which are currently applied in chemical, environmental, and medical science. These techniques include: chromatography including GC and LC spectroscopy (UV-Vis, FT-IR, AA, fluoremetry, and NMR), surface science and mass spectrometry. Students will increase their repertoire of laboratory skills while learning to integrate concepts from different subdisciplines of chemistry into a unified experimental approach to problem solving.

CHEM-311-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Fall) Protein Biochemistry and Cellular Metabolism

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

(Biochemistry 311f; Biological Sciences 311f)

This course is a rigorous introduction to the study of protein molecules and their role as catalysts of the cell. Topics include general principles of protein folding, protein structure-function correlation, enzyme kinetics and mechanism, carbohydrate and lipid biochemistry, and metabolic pathways (catabolic and anabolic) and their interaction and cross-regulation. Biological transformation of energy is considered in light of the principle of thermodynamics.

Prerequisites: Biological Sciences 210 (can be taken concurrently), and Chemistry 302

CHEM-317-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Principles of Polymer Chemistry

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

An introduction to the study of molecules of high molecular weights with emphasis on synthetic rather than naturally occurring polymers. Topics include polymerization, structures, molecular weight determination, molecular weight distribution, chain configurations, rubber elasticity, and thermodynamics and statistical mechanics of polymer solutions.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 302

Notes: offered once every three years

Instructors: W. Chen

CHEM-325-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Atomic and Molecular Structure

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course is an introduction to experimental and theoretical approaches to the determination of the structure of atoms, molecules, and chemical bonds. Classroom work provides background in the theory of atomic and molecular structure and an introduction to quantum mechanics and spectroscopy.

Prerequisites: Physics 216, Mathematics 202, Chemistry 202 with grade of C or better

Instructors: W. Chen

Section Instructors: 01 LAB H Jayathilake | 02 LAB H Jayathilake |

CHEM-334-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Advanced Inorganic Chemistry - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

The implications of molecular symmetry as expressed in the language of group theory are explored in some depth. Group theory provides the context for a discussion of the structural and spectroscopic properties of inorganic compounds, particularly those of the transition metals.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 302 and either: Chemistry 325 in the past or taken concurrently with this course.

Notes: offered every other year

Instructors: D. Cotter
Expected enrollment: 15

CHEM-336-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Organic Synthesis - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course emphasizes recent developments in synthetic organic chemistry and deals with general synthetic methods and specific examples of natural product synthesis. It covers such topics as new methods of oxidation and reduction, stereospecific olefin formation, ring-forming reactions, and methods of carbon-carbon bond formation. The application of these reactions to the synthesis of naturally occurring compounds is examined. A general strategy for the synthesis of complex molecules is also presented.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 302
Notes: offered every other year
Instructors: D. Hamilton
Expected enrollment: 20

CHEM-337-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Fall) Physical Organic Chemistry

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

An introduction to the concepts and methods of physical organic chemistry. Examination of reaction mechanisms and the experimental results that support these mechanisms. Topics include structure and reactivity, reaction kinetics, mechanism determinations, and Woodward-Hoffman Rules.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 302, 308
Notes: offered every other year
Instructors: S. Browne
Expected enrollment: 25

(Fall) The Organic Chemistry of Biological Pathways - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course explores the underlying organic chemistry of biological pathways and thereby seeks to build a framework for understanding biological transformations from the perspective of mechanistic organic chemistry. Beginning with common biological mechanisms, and drawing parallels with their sophomore organic chemistry counterparts, a broad overview will be constructed of the pathways by which the key classes of biological molecules--lipids, carbohydrates, amino acids, nucleotides--are manufactured, modified, and consumed. Several specific biosyntheses will also be dissected from a mechanistic perspective. These case studies will include antibiotics, an alkaloid, and heme.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 302
Instructors: D. Hamilton
Expected enrollment: 20

CHEM-343-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Spring) Chemistry of DNA - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking-intensive)

This advanced-level seminar will focus on the molecular properties of DNA. Using as sources a graduate-level text and readings from the primary literature, the class will discuss a variety of current topics in the research community, including the binding of proteins and small molecules to DNA, the covalent modification of DNA by mutagenic agents, and the dynamic nature of DNA across timescales. Critical analysis of experimental design and conclusions from data will be encouraged. Students will be evaluated based on participation in discussions, oral presentations, and an original research proposal.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 302 and one additional 300-level chemistry course
Instructors: M. Nunez
Expected enrollment: 12

CHEM-345-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Fall) Physical Biochemistry - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course introduces the fields of biophysical chemistry and molecular biophysics, where biological systems are probed and described by physical techniques and models. Topics will include the physical properties of biological molecules (proteins, nucleic acids, carbohydrates, and lipid membranes); applications of spectroscopy to biological systems, both in vitro and in vivo; the mechanisms of light harvesting and energy conversion; and technological developments inspired by biological systems. Lecture sessions (two per week) will be complemented by a weekly discussion of papers from the contemporary literature.

Prerequisites: Chemistry 302 required; Chemistry 212, Biochemistry 311 or Biology 220 recommended, or permission of instructor

CHEM-399-01 - Chemistry - 2012-2013

(Fall) Comprehensive Seminar

Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

A seminar series consisting of meetings on alternate weeks to discuss articles from the current chemical literature. The readings will prepare students for attendance at lectures on the chosen topics in the remaining weeks. The lectures are given primarily by visiting speakers, but they may include department faculty. Students will serve as discussion leaders, and each student will write a paper on a presentation of her choice.

Prerequisites: Chemistry majors only. Two semesters required, spring (as a junior) fall (as a senior)

Notes: Credit/No Credit grading only

Classics

CLASS-127-01 - Classics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Ancient Greece - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(History 127f)

This course will trace the emergence and expansion of Greek civilization in the Mediterranean. From the philosophical parlors of Athens to the martial gymnasia of Sparta, the Greek city-states developed diverse political systems, social structures, and cultures. Alexander the Great then exported this legacy across the Near East. Among the themes of the course will be Greek thought, social relations, encounters with Near Eastern peoples, especially Persians and Jews, and the incorporation of the Greek world into the Roman empire. Sources will include works of classical Greek literature, as well as the more mundane insights of inscriptions, papyri, and archaeology.

Instructors: R. Payne

Expected enrollment: 35

CLASS-128-01 - Classics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Ancient Rome - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(History 128)

A survey of the political, social, and cultural history of Rome from the Republic to the Empire, down to the early fourth century and the rise of Constantine. We shall strive to recreate the entire experience of the peoples of the Roman Empire and those who came in contact with it as it rose to become the dominant power in the Mediterranean. Topics include their history, war, trade and technology, religion, republican government and imperial administration, slavery, economics, and the Roman family. Sources include Polybius, Sallust, Livy, Suetonius, Tacitus, Seneca, Plutarch, and others.

Expected enrollment: 40

CLASS-211-01 - Classics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Gods and Mortals: Ancient Greek and Roman Myth

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

We will accompany Odysseus on his return from Troy, retrieve the Golden Fleece with Jason, and race with Ovid through his witty--and often troubling--retelling of Greek myths from a Roman perspective. This course examines how Greek and Roman authors and artists from very different periods used myth to explore questions about life, art, and politics. Works include: Homer, Odyssey; Apollonius of Rhodes, Argonautica; Ovid, Metamorphoses and Heroides; Greek tragedy, and ancient images representing myths.

Prerequisites: most spaces will be reserved for first-years and sophomores

Notes: Optional screenings of films related to ancient myth.

(Spring) Athenian Democracy and Its Foes - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(History 225)

Democracy first took root in Athens in the late sixth century BCE and flourished, with only brief interruptions, until the city came under the power of Macedon in the latter part of the fourth century BCE. This course will trace the development of Athenian democracy and examine such topics as citizenship; the role of women, the family, and non-citizens in Athens; the legal system; education; and public entertainment. It will also compare democratic Athens with Sparta, its antithesis in the classical period. Sources will include Herodotus, Thucydides, Aristophanes, Plato, Aristotle, Demosthenes, and others.

(Fall) The City of Athens from Theseus to Alaric

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English; Art History 290-02)

A detailed survey of the principal surviving monuments and the overall architectural development of the city of Athens from its origins in the Bronze Age to the end of the 4th century C.E. The archaeological evidence will be discussed against a broader cultural and historical background, with an emphasis on the specific people and events that helped to shape the city and the general social and political circumstances that gave the monuments meaning.

(Fall) Knowing God - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course examines the following key texts from the ancient world that treat significantly the problem of knowing God and the mystery enveloping such knowledge: Sophocles' Oedipus the King, Plato's Phaedo, Cicero's Concerning the Nature of the Gods, Job, Paul's Epistle to the Romans, and others.

Attention is also given to the different ways of thinking about the divine and human natures in these works, which are broadly reflective of Graeco-Roman and Judaeo-Christian value systems.

(Fall) Introductory Seminar: Reading the New Yorker

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)

Students will subscribe to this venerable and influential magazine and will closely examine the best items across departments, from the editorial board's short pieces on politics, to analytical articles, amusing vignettes, opinionated reviews and the famous cartoons. (Occasional readings will be drawn from the New Yorker's archive). Also included: selections from James Thurber's The Years with Ross, Brendan Gill's At the New Yorker, and Garrison Keillor's Love Me; and discussions of the history of the magazine and its impact on American letters, up to its recent Russian focus under the editorship of David Remnick. Writing exercises will be modeled on articles studied.

(Spring) Introductory Seminar: Stressed Out - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)

We've all been there. Each of us carries a deep physical understanding of what its like to be under stress. But what are the evolutionary and biological underpinnings of this experience? How and why do our bodies respond to stress in such a characteristic way? And what is the impact of this biological response on health and disease? Through reading and discussion, we'll explore the biology of stress, the brain's ability to link the outer and inner worlds, the organ systems whose activity is altered by the stress response, and emerging research on the impact of long-term stress on memory, immune function, cardiovascular health, and cancer risk.

(Fall) Introductory Seminar: Encountering the Sacred: The Bible and Reading

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

Martin Buber famously wrote that we must read the Bible "as though it were something entirely unfamiliar, as though it had not been set before us ready-made." Whether you come to the Bible from within a faith tradition or not, this course will ask you to do just that. We'll take a text that for more than 2,000 years has stood at the heart of the Western tradition and ask how we can approach that text today, from the place where you stand. What does it mean to read a sacred text? How has it been read by people situated both within and at the margins of Western culture? What are the possibilities for your reading?

(Fall) Introductory Seminar: Community Narratives: Digital Storytelling at Mount Holyoke College

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

Digital stories (three- to five-minute narrative videos) enable individuals and communities to express themselves in their own voices and gain social visibility. In this course, students will produce digital stories about their first-year experience as a way to reflect on their intellectual lives at Mount Holyoke. As a model for digital storytelling, we will examine digital stories produced by Latina/o youth and compare them to dominant narratives in mainstream media. While writing intensive, this seminar will also develop students' technical skills, particularly in the use of images, sound, and digital effects.

(Fall) Introductory Seminar: How to Become a Successful Language Learner

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Taught in English)

This seminar will provide an understanding of the language learning process and will help students develop strategies to increase their ability in learning a second language. Students will be encouraged to reflect critically on language learning issues through a variety of topics, such as different theories of second language acquisition, individual factors considered to play a role in acquiring a language -aptitude, motivation, age, personality, learning styles, etc.-, and how these factors are related to those strategies which have been identified in the literature as "good language learners' strategies". This course will enable students to become more independent learners able to take control over their own learning experience.

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course is designed for students who have recently completed summer internships and research projects to help them integrate their experience within the context of their liberal arts education and career goals. Students will apply problem-solving skills to various situations that occurred during their summer project; learn how to identify and articulate transferable skills gained during the project to potential employers and graduate schools; discuss how the experience has affirmed and/or modified their career goals; learn strategies to identify and network with individuals to advance their professional and academic development; and prepare a presentation on their internship or research project for the fall LEAP Symposium.

Notes: Class meeting dates: 9/10, 9/24, 10/1, 10/15, and 10/22. Students are also required to present at the LEAP Symposium on Friday, Oct. 12, 2012.

Instructors: H. Hanson

COLL-225-01 - College Courses - 2012-2013

(Fall) Topics in Leadership: Women, Business, and Leadership Development

Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

What does leadership mean and what does it look like? What does it mean to become as leader in a business context? And what does this mean for women? In this six-week course, we will examine research literature and case examples from various business contexts including small businesses, nonprofits, and larger corporations. Topics will include: leadership capacities, models of leading and managing, effective mentoring and networking, women's career development, and negotiation and influence.

Prerequisites: so, jr, sr

Notes: Half-semester course, beginning October 23. No letter-grading (credit/no-credit only).

Instructors: B. Packard, J. Lansberry

Complex Organizations

COMOR-115-01 - Complex Organizations - 2012-2013

(Fall) Perspectives in Global Business

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

First-year seminar

We study the behavior of consumers, producers, and their interactions in markets. How do consumer, producer, and social welfare depend on market organization and regulatory institutions? How do competition and international trade affect consumers and firms? How do the decisions that businesses make affect employees, customers, suppliers, the community, and the environment? How do businesses make decisions about advertising and pricing? We use case studies and microeconomic theory to explore these and other questions.

(Spring) Financial Accounting

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

The course, while using traditional accounting techniques and methodology, will focus on the needs of external users of financial information. The emphasis is on learning how to read, interpret, and analyze financial information as a tool to guide investment decisions. Concepts rather than procedures are stressed and class time will be largely devoted to problem solutions and case discussions. A basic knowledge of arithmetic (+, -, *, /) and a familiarity with a spreadsheet program is suggested. See <http://www.mtholyoke.edu/courses/cljohnso>

Prerequisites: so, jr, sr
Instructors: S. Schmeiser
Expected enrollment: 75

(Fall) Individuals and Organizations

This course focuses on individual and small-group behavior in the organizational setting. The basic objective is to increase knowledge and understanding of human behavior in organizations - especially each individual's own behavior. Three types of knowledge are stressed: (1) intellectual information regarding human behavior in an organizational context; (2) understanding of oneself as a person and as a leader; and (3) behavioral skills in dealing with people.

(Spring) Leadership and the Liberal Arts: Non-Profit Management and Business Practice

This course introduces students to the issues and challenges of leading a non-profit organization. Covered topics include dealing with boards, workers and volunteers and external agencies. We will consider funding and revenue sources as well as cost management. Finally, the course will explore strategic planning and program evaluation. The course will feature an embedded practitioner with substantial leadership experience in higher education. Notes: The course will be a case study based course and students will be required to do a substantial project on a non-profit of their choosing.

COMSC-100-01 - Computer Science - 2012-2013

(Fall) An Introduction to Computer Science

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

An introduction to basic computer science concepts and issues with a focus on HTML and JavaScript programming. Additional topics will be chosen from: origins of computers, computer architecture, assemblers and compilers, digital logic, the Internet, and artificial intelligence. Laboratory assignments will offer some experience with programming and the use of application software.

Notes: students should NOT take this course after Computer Science 101

(Fall) Problem Solving and Object-Oriented Programming

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Computers are used every day for an enormous variety of tasks, from playing games and chatting with friends to transferring billions of dollars, delivering radiation treatments, and controlling the electrical grid. Computer programs are an essential ingredient in allowing for this great diversity of applications. In this course, you will learn to create your own programs, based on core programming concepts and analytical problem solving approaches. You will develop dynamic programs by first using Adobe Flash CS4 and AS3 (ActionScript 3), the technology behind many Web applications. The last portion of the course will teach you Java, a very popular modern programming language. We assume no prior study of computer science. Programming intensive.

(Fall) First Year Seminar:: Robots in Society

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

First-year seminar

The last decade of the 20th century gave us some amazing innovations: virtual reality therapy, long-distance robotic surgery, wearable computers, robotic spacecraft, robots that paint pictures and play soccer. As social, more human-like robots are being developed, science fiction media suggests that robots will eventually take over. In this course, we will examine fascinating innovations in robotics and their impact on society and we will explore the intersection between reality and science fiction. Students will also have the opportunity to build and train their own robots.

(Fall) Advanced Object-Oriented Programming

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

This course builds on the basic programming concepts learned in Computer Science 101. Emphasis is on developing the skills needed to write more sophisticated programs. This includes strategies to aid in assuring the correctness of programs through the use of assertions and unit testing as well as advanced Java features such as inheritance, polymorphism, and network programming. We will also introduce some widely used data structures such as vectors and linked lists. This course is programming-intensive.

(Fall) Data Structures

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Using Java. Solving problems with computers is accomplished by writing programs that operate on data to produce a desired result. The way data is organized and presented to the program can significantly affect its efficiency and simplicity and can sometimes determine whether or not a program can be written to solve the problem at all. This course presents ways of organizing data into "data structures" and analyzes how structuring the data can improve program performance. This course is programming intensive.

(Fall) Software Design - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Building large software systems introduces new challenges to software development. Appropriate design decisions early in the development of large software can make a major difference in developing software that is correct and maintainable. In this course, students will learn techniques and tools to help them address these problems and develop larger software projects, improving their skills in designing, writing, debugging, and testing software. Topics include design patterns, UML, designing for maintainability, software architecture, and designing concurrent and fault tolerant systems. Programming intensive.

(Fall) Theory of Computation - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Are there any limits to what computers can do? Does the answer to this question depend on whether you use a PC or a Mac? Is C more powerful than PASCAL? This seminar explores these questions by investigating several models of computation, illustrating the power and limitations of each of these models, and relating them to computational problems and applications. Topics include finite state automata, pushdown automata, grammars, Turing machines, the Universal Turing Machine, and computability.

Prerequisites: Computer Science 101,102(aka 201) and Mathematics 232

(Spring) Algorithms

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

How does Mapquest find the best route between two locations? How do computers help to decode the human genome? At the heart of these and other complex computer applications are nontrivial algorithms. While algorithms must be specialized to an application, there are some standard ways of approaching algorithmic problems that tend to be useful in many applications. Among other topics, we will explore graph algorithms, greedy algorithms, divide-and-conquer, dynamic programming, and network flow. We will learn to recognize when to apply each of these strategies as well as to evaluate the expected runtime costs of the algorithms we design.

(Spring) Software Practicum - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Tired of writing programs that nobody ever uses? Then, this is the course for you. Software enables enterprises to carry out previously tedious or impossible tasks, but many organizations lack the resources to develop needed software. You will apply your programming skills to develop and deliver software to meet the requirements of a client from the community. You will learn critical communication skills required to work with a client, work as a team with classmates, and experience the software lifecycle from requirements elicitation through delivery. You will synthesize many topics learned in courses as well as new technologies required to complete the project. Programming intensive.

COMSC-322-01 - Computer Science - 2012-2013

(Fall) Operating Systems

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

An introduction to the issues involved in orchestrating the use of computer resources. Topics include operating system evolution, file-handling systems, memory management, virtual memory, resource scheduling, multiprogramming, deadlocks, concurrent processes, protection, and design principles. Course emphasis: understanding the effects of operating system design on computer system performance. This course is programming intensive.

(Spring) Computer Graphics - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

The creation of pictorial images using a computer. Topics include drawing of two- and three-dimensional scenes using OpenGL and other graphical environments; transformations of objects (translations, scalings, rotations, shearings) using homogeneous coordinates; creating perspective in three-dimensional drawing; algorithms for enhancing realism and visual effect; and the mathematical underpinnings of graphic design. Students will complete a number of graphics projects based on readings and class discussion. This course is programming intensive.

(Spring) Topics: Computational Geometry in Video Games - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Developing video games is an exciting and challenging domain, involving many areas of computer science, such as graphics, artificial intelligence and robotics. In this course, we focus on the geometric problems that arise in video game programming. Due to the expensive computations often demanded by current video game technology, efficient algorithms are required that not only satisfy speed requirements, but result in realistic user experiences. Topics will include standard problems from computational geometry, such as triangulation of 2-D and 3-D objects, point detection and visibility.

Prerequisites: Computer Science 211 Data Structures, Math 232 Discrete - Recommended: CS 312 Algorithms, Math 211 Linear Algebra

Critical Social Thought

CST-100-01 - Critical Social Thought - 2012-2013

(Fall) First Year Seminar: Experiments in Critical Social Thought

First-year seminar

This course will examine the relationship among the lives of thinkers who broke with their own worlds, the new visions of reality they created, and the historical context that provoked and in turn was provoked by their ideas. Readings will include short theoretical and fictional works, memoirs and biographies, historical narratives, and secondary critical commentaries.

Prerequisites: fy

Instructors: C. Pleshakov

Expected enrollment: 20

(Fall) First-year Seminar: Self and Political Thought - *Not offered this year/term

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Politics 100f(02))

What is the relationship between personal experience and political thought? How do political thinkers grasp and convey the connections between self and political order? Our first-year seminar will probe the links between heart and mind in political philosophy by exploring the lives and writings of illustrative figures who together span the history of political thought. Texts will include memoirs and fiction as well as abstract theoretical works

Instructors: J. Cocks

Expected enrollment: 16

CST-100-03 - Critical Social Thought - 2012-2013

(Fall) First-year Seminar: What Is Performance? - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Theatre Arts 150 (02))

What's the difference between acting and being, and how does the idea of "performance" structure this difference? How do we "perform" our own identities, and how do we interpret the performances of others? This seminar offers a basic introduction to performance studies, an exciting new discipline through which everyday life, ritual behaviors, and artistic practices are studied. Perspectives from the arts, humanities, and social sciences will be explored using both textual and performative approaches. This is a speaking-, reading-, and writing-intensive class that includes innovative individual and group exercises.

Prerequisites: fy or permission of instructor

Instructors: E. Rundle

Expected enrollment: 14

CST-204-01 - Critical Social Thought - 2012-2013

(Spring) Topics in Critical Social Thought: Gender and Animality

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 204)

Are animals persons? Subjects? Do they have gender? Important shifts in public opinion have taken place concerning the moral, legal, and affective status of animals, yet liberal Academia still marginalizes the "animal question." In this course, we will draw on feminism's engagement against speciesism to chart diverse forms of human/non-human companionship. The analytic categories of gender and species will be examined side by side for their usefulness in understanding a world in which we no longer approach the human as the great exception. We will consider theory, fiction, films, art work, and the internet in approaching post-human concepts of life, personhood, and subjectivity.

Prerequisites: 4 credits in Gender Studies or Critical Social Thought

Instructors: C. Gundermann

Expected enrollment: 25

CST-248-01 - Critical Social Thought - 2012-2013

(Spring) Science, Revolution, and Modernity

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(History 248)

Introduces critical analysis of science and technology by tracing the historiography of the Scientific Revolution. The significance of this extended intellectual episode has been assessed in radically different ways throughout the intervening centuries. As such, it provides a fertile ground on which to pose and answer important questions about science and its role in society. What does it mean to regard science as 'revolutionary'? How are scientific developments shaped by, and how do they shape, the social, economic, and political worlds in which they are embedded? How is our contemporary understanding of science and technology influenced by the stories we tell about the past?

CST-250-01 - Critical Social Thought - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introduction to Nineteenth-Century Critical Social Thought

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Taught in English; German Studies 231)

Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the reader's responses to them.

An introduction to some of the great critical voices of the nineteenth century with emphasis on their relevance for contemporary issues. We will explore the ideas of such mutinous thinkers as Karl Marx Friedrich Nietzsche, Sigmund Freud, Fyodor Dostoyevsky, W.E.B. Du Bois and Franz Kafka focusing on the style as well as the substance of their works and the circumstances that provoked them to write and/or that their writings helped provoke. The course will highlight the tension between appearance and reality, the dialectic of domination and subordination, and the place of reason and irrationality in social life. Case studies of contemporary issues with attention to the impact of 19th century thinkers on critical theory in the 20th and 21st centuries also round out the course.

Prerequisites: so, jr, sr, or permission of instructor

Notes: Students with one or more years of college-level German may opt for German 232, a tutorial in close reading and translation of the German texts related to the material in 231. Students with no previous study of German are encouraged to take German 101 or 103 to complement this course.

(Fall) Histories of Performance I

(Theatre Arts 251f(01))

A survey of world performance history, including: the evolution of human language and consciousness; the rise of oral, ritual, and shamanic performance; religious and civic festivals; and imperial theatre practices that position the stage at the dangerous intersection of religious worship, public taste, royal patronage, and government censure. Understanding performance as both artistic practice and social institution, this course emphasizes the role performance has played in changing audiences and as a cultural and political force in various societies. We explore not only how performances were created--in terms of design, dramaturgy, architecture, and acting--but also for whom, and why.

(Fall) Backwards? Rethinking (Under)Development in the Spanish-Speaking World

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

When and how did the notion of "development" emerge and spread? Why does nearly every country now aspire to it? What stigmas and hierarchies does the term "underdevelopment" imply? Throughout the Spanish-Speaking world, "development" has proved problematic not only as a material reality but also as a framework for understanding place, time, and selfhood. For that reason, Latin American countries and Spain are ideal places from which to question commonly accepted understandings of "development" as well as associated concepts such as "modernization" and "progress." In this course, students rethink "development" through the study of a variety of writers and filmmakers from several countries.

(Fall) Advanced Studies: Twentieth-Century American Dance: Sixties Vanguard to Nineties Hip-Hop - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This survey of twentieth-century American dance moves from the sixties--a decade of revolt and redefinition in American modern dance that provoked new ideas about dance, the dancer's body, and a radically changed dance aesthetic--to the radical postmodernism of the nineties, when the body continued to be the site for debates about the nature of gender, ethnicity, and sexuality. We will investigate how the political and social environment, particularly the civil rights/black power movement, anti-war/student movement, and the women's movement, with its proliferation of feminist performance works, informed the work of succeeding generations of dance artists.

(Spring) Development and Transition in China

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This 200-level course investigates a particular topic in economics at some depth without presupposing prior knowledge of economics. Many students may find one or more of these courses useful complements to majors and minors other than economics.

This course first explores institutional changes reshaping the Chinese economy and larger society over the past three and a half decades and then focuses on the interplay of current structures of the economy with non-economic (political, cultural, and environmental) processes in generating rapid economic growth and relative macroeconomic stability. Recent reforms in financial institutions and financial relationships, as a nexus in the transformation and globalization of the Chinese economy, will receive special attention and serve as the entry point into an analysis of the potential for future economic/financial crises.

ENGL-101-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Fall) Seminar in Reading, Writing, and Reasoning: Images of the Self

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): Though sections of English 101 differ in specific content, all develop the skills of careful reading and effective writing essential to the liberal arts and sciences. Students will write frequently and have an opportunity to revise their work. By active participation in class discussion, students will develop their speaking skills and learn to ask critical questions, formulate answers, and frame persuasive arguments. Students who do not take the course in the fall should consider enrolling in the spring. Like other first-year seminars, English 101 is intended primarily for students at the start of their college career.

This course will look at how the question "Who am I?" has formed works of literature. We will investigate how identity is formed or not formed by forces such as society, circumstance, and family. We'll examine body image, race, gender, class, personal voice, perception, and ancestry. Course material will be drawn from poetry, fiction, drama, memoir, and film, including Maxine Hong Kingston's The Woman Warrior and Shakespeare's As

You Like It, as well as shorter readings by Emily Dickinson, Adrienne Rich, Dorothy Allison, Alice Walker, Zora Neale Hurston, and Jamaica Kincaid. Students will have the opportunity to explore themselves, both as individuals and as writers.

Prerequisites: Only first-year students may preregister for this course. Sophomores, juniors, and seniors may inquire if there is space available during the first two weeks of class.

(Spring) Seminar in Reading, Writing, and Reasoning: Love and Money

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): Though sections of English 101 differ in specific content, all develop the skills of careful reading and effective writing essential to the liberal arts and sciences. Students will write frequently and have an opportunity to revise their work. By active participation in class discussion, students will develop their speaking skills and learn to ask critical questions, formulate answers, and frame persuasive arguments. Students who do not take the course in the fall should consider enrolling in the spring. Like other first-year seminars, English 101 is intended primarily for students at the start of their college career.

In novels, plays, and poems by writers as various as William Shakespeare, Jane Austen, and Oscar Wilde, love and money frequently stand in for and in opposition to each other. In this course we will develop critical reading and writing skills by analyzing how writers from the early modern period to our own use the intersection of financial and affective economies to define concepts of value, gender, and work. Reading may also include texts by C. Rossetti, Millay, Auden, as well as some contemporary writers.

Prerequisites: fy (soph, jr, and sr may inquire if there is space available during the first two weeks of class)

Instructors: E. Meadows

This course examines literary representations of worlds and world-making. We will explore how major British authors interpret the idea of the world, as well as how they construct fictional worlds of complexity and beauty. We will consider how the notion of "world" is defined in relation to the cosmos, nature, human society, empire, and travel. A consistent theme will be the depiction of other or new worlds, suggested by places that are remote, abstract, or imaginary. Readings may include Utopia, The Tempest, Paradise Lost, Gulliver's Travels, Robinson Crusoe, and The Rime of the Ancient Mariner.

In American literature (1880-1930), what conversations take place between writers (like Twain, Wharton, Cather, Cahan, Hopkins, Fitzgerald, Larsen) and their texts? Recurring themes in historical context: new roles for women; race in the Jim Crow era; the relationship of science to literature; mass immigration and assimilation; and anxieties about city life, passing, and changing values. We will be less concerned with defining the period than with honing awareness as readers also participating in literary conversations. How have perspectives in literary criticism changed over a hundred years? Why do tastes and reading lists in English courses change?

In order to circumvent exclusion, persecution, or violence, individuals have been compelled to impersonate members of a ruling class by hiding key aspects of their identities, be it their Jewish or Black roots, or their gender identities. This course considers the various stakes of racial, ethnic, gender, and sexual passing. How does passing violate a natural social order, and what situations motivate characters to conceal or project aspects of their identity? Topics will include racial subversion, transgenderism/transsexualism, and whiteness as property. Authors may include David Henry Hwang, Nella Larsen, Philip Roth, Tobias Wolff, Danzy Senna, and Jeffrey Eugenides.

Prerequisites: Only first-year students may preregister for this course. Sophomores, juniors, and seniors may inquire if there is space available during the first two weeks of class.

(Fall) Academic Discourse and Multilingual Speakers

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): Course readings and writing assignments guide students through an examination of topics related to society and culture. In this course we seek to achieve clarity and precision of expression within a discussion of complex questions. Past semesters' topics include: the role of education in society; the relationship between religion, culture, and nature; and the use of maps in ordering the world. In addition to the academic content, the course focuses on the writing and revising process, academic research and argumentation, and the nature and purpose of academic discourse. This course is intended for students whose native language is not English and who would like to refine their writing and speaking skills. Although it is the first in a two-course sequence (103-104), multilingual students who have already taken English 104 may register.

(Fall) Introduction to Creative Writing

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Writing-intensive)

In this class we will use pictures of mythological characters and scenes as inspiration for a series of exercises which focus on the different components of creative prose: description, characterization, dialogue, point of view, scene, and dramatic action. We will also devote a week to reading and writing poetry based on mythic themes. The exercises will serve as a basis for a flight into your own mythmaking, and the final result will be a complete short story that reflects both your engagement with myths of the past and the creation of a "mythic" world that is entirely your own.

(Spring) Introduction to Journalism

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Community-based learning course; Writing-intensive)

The finest journalists are professors to the people. They educate citizens so as to facilitate reasoned, fact-based dialogue on subjects as diverse as politics, poverty, war, science, and the arts. We will look at journalism's role in the culture as well as some of its failings and foibles. Students will try their hand at writing about an event, a person and an issue using the reporter's skills of interviewing, research, and thoughtful analysis to produce snapshots of the world inside and outside the College gates. Curiosity leads. Mastery follows.

(Spring) Playwriting

(Writing-intensive; Theatre Arts 283)

This course offers practice in the fundamentals of dramatic structure and technique. Weekly reading assignments will examine the unique nature of writing for the theatre, nuts and bolts of format, tools of the craft, and the playwright's process from formulating a dramatic idea to rewriting. Weekly writing assignments will include scenework, adaptation, and journaling. The course will culminate in the writing of a one-act play. Each class meeting will incorporate reading student work aloud with feedback from the instructor and the class. Students will listen, critique, and develop the vocabulary to discuss plays, structure, story, and content.

(Fall) Expository Prose: The History of the Essay

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

Since the seventeenth century, prose stylists have written essays to examine, analyze, argue, satirize, and present social, scientific, and artistic theories. The course focuses on the evolution of the sentence, prose rhythms, grammatical patterns, paragraph coherence, and developmental structures. Students will master the form by writing their own essays. Readings: Francis Bacon, John Donne, Jonathan Swift, Samuel Johnson, Henry David Thoreau, Virginia Woolf, George Orwell, Martin Luther King, Adrienne Rich, Stephen Jay Gould, and others.

(Spring) Expository Prose: Making the Argument

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

Societies are refined through the exchange of information and ideas. This course explores that exchange as it occurs in three distinct forms: the public speech, opinion (or op-ed) pieces, and satire. Students will team up for close readings of various texts, exploring work representing opposing views on issues ranging from the environment to economic policy. Writing requirements are intensive and revolve around the production and refinement of an original work in each genre. Intended for students in all disciplines who seek mastery as prose stylists confronting the contentious issues of the day.

(Spring) Topics in Medieval Studies: Love and Reason in Medieval Romance

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

Arthurian legend conjures enduring stereotypes of chivalry and romantic love, but how do we go about situating medieval romance in literary history? Where does it come from, why was it written, who read it, and how did it change over time? In this course, students will learn about romance's historical and social contexts, its form, tropes, and imagery. We will think about romance's contemplation of justice, loyalty, subjectivity, love, and shame, especially as this body of literature grapples with the conflicts that arise between the mortal and divine. Course readings will include works by Marie de France, Chrétien de Troyes, Chaucer, Lydgate, and Spenser. We will read in Middle English where possible.

Prerequisites: English 200; English 210, 213, or permission from instructor

Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement

(Spring) Introduction to British Literary and Cultural Studies since 1660: Culture and Society: 1798-1900

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a broad study of selected figures in modern literary and intellectual history and helps prepare students for more advanced classes in British and/or postcolonial studies. We will use these figures to probe the dynamic relationship between imaginative practice and social change, which may involve global as well as national contexts. This course will introduce students to writing sustained pieces of critical analysis, challenging them to explore the theoretical relationship between literary form and historical transformation in the modern period.

This course will examine a number of major literary texts from the Lyrical Ballads of Wordsworth and Coleridge through Conrad's Heart of Darkness. The focus will be on major poets and novelists of the period, but we will also consider some nonfiction prose writers as well. The course will be particularly concerned with the literary response to social change such as the migration from the country to the city, the rise of industry, the situation of women, and the legacy of imperialist expansion.

(Fall) British Romanticism: Revolution and Reaction - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This class will examine the ways Romantic-era writers figured revolution and the reaction against it, in the wake of the French Revolution's spectacular but failed promises of liberty, fraternity, and equality for all. We will pay special attention to how British writers envisioned their own versions of freedom and equality, extending them to women, slaves, and the poor. Likewise we will explore how this project for social change was necessarily related to revolutions in language and aesthetics. Authors may include Burke, Wordsworth, Coleridge, Smith, Barbauld, Blake, Austen, Keats, Percy and Mary Shelley, Byron, and Hemans.

(Fall) Modern British Poetry

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This introduction to modern British poetry pays special attention to the emergence, consolidation, and dismantling of modernist poetry and poetics. It will link this literary history with, amongst other things, the loss of faith, the two world wars, and the relationship between monumental aesthetics, utopian poetics, and totalitarian politics. Writers will include Hardy, Yeats, Eliot, H.D., and Auden.

(Fall) Modern Scottish Literature

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

In The Quarry Wood, Martha's father teaches her, "Scotland is bounded on the South by England...and on the West by Eternity." This course explores that paradox, tracing the relationship of Scottish literature to European history and the making of Scottish identity, understanding language and form as political actions in the creation of Scotland's national, international, and mythologized identities. Selections survey Enlightenment thought, sentimentalized Scotland (the Kailyard school), grim "realism," modern novels, and contemporary fiction, and may include Hume, Smith, Scott, Burns, Barrie, Stevenson, MacDiarmid, Gibbon, E. Muir, W. Muir, Shepherd, Kelman, television, and film.

ENGL-238-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Spring) Modern Irish Literature

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This survey course will introduce students to literature of modern Ireland beginning with Swift and ending with writers of the Irish literary revival and Irish modernists. The syllabus will also focus on Irish women writers and their literary interventions concerning colonial history, nationalism, and Unionism. We will pay particular attention to representations of ideas of Irishness through the categories of religion, race, gender, and culture. The course encourages students to think about how the genres, styles, and forms of Irish writing are determined by the experience of colonial trauma and the imperative to imagine national identity.

(Fall) Novels of the Later Eighteenth Century: Worthy Hearts and Saucy Wits - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Gender Studies 204f(02))

Eighteenth-century England witnessed the birth of the novel, a genre that in its formative years was both lauded for its originality and condemned as intellectually and morally dangerous, especially for young women. We will trace the numerous prose genres that influenced early novelists, including conduct manuals, epistolary writing, conversion narratives, travelogues, romance, and the gothic. In doing so, we will concomitantly examine the novel's immense formal experimentation alongside debates about developing notions of gender and class as well as the feeling, thinking individual. Authors may include Richardson, Fielding, Sterne, Walpole, Burney, and others.

(Spring) Topics in Nineteenth-Century Literature: When Families Attack

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive)

Although nineteenth-century political economists and social theorists often invoked the family as the building block of social organization, novelists paradoxically persisted in portraying families that were anything but exemplary. In this course we will explore how literary representations of families articulate and resist ideas of class, gender, privacy, and identity. We will track the evolving concept of family in novels by Austen, E. Brontë, Gaskell, A. Trollope, and Dickens to investigate how familial power dynamics function in opposition to or connivance with larger social networks and structures.

(Spring) Topics in American Literature: The American Essay

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Throughout our history, the essay has been a vital literary genre. From personal, religious, and confessional essays to highly political, satirical, and sometimes preposterous ones, American authors have revealed their passions and hatreds both eloquently and roughly. We will read essays from the eighteenth century to the present, concentrating on masters of the form. Authors include Ralph Waldo Emerson, Mark Twain, Henry James, James Baldwin, Joan Didion, Gore Vidal, and E. B. White.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Film Studies 220)

An examination of the gothic--a world of fear, haunting, claustrophobia, paranoia, and monstrosity--in American literature and culture, with an emphasis upon issues of race and gender. Topics include the gothic; gothic sexuality; Southern, Northern, and national gothic; freakishness and grotesquerie; and visual gothic. Focus on fiction, with some film and photography. Authors, filmmakers, and artists may include Alcott, Arbus, Browning, Crane, Dunbar, Dunn, Elmer, Faulkner, Gilman, Hitchcock, Kubrick, McCullers, Morrison, O'Connor, Oates, Parks, Poe, Romero, Turner, and Wood.

(Spring) Poetry Now: Reading the New American Lyric

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

An introduction to American poetry in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries. What fuels the contemporary American poetic imagination? What is its shape and form? Along with supplementary essays, criticism and reviews, we'll focus on a wide range of poets, including John Ashbery, Louise Gluck, Jorie Graham, Claudia Rankine, James Tate, Terrance Hayes and Tracy K. Smith. We'll attune our ears to the pulse, music, and tone of the "new" lyric, while foraging for fresh images and metaphors. As we explore this moment's "nuances of the ego" (Harold Bloom), we'll also identify the values that chiefly define our nation's poetry today.

ENGL-250-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Fall) African American Literature

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course offers an introduction to the literary works of African Americans from the late-eighteenth century to the present, with an emphasis on poetry and fiction. Beginning with slave narratives and early poetry, we will consider issues of genre, literary traditions, and historical context while gaining experience in reading and analyzing literary texts. We will examine how authors consciously went about creating a literary tradition that mirrored, challenged and created a dialogue with the American canon.

ENGL-251-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Spring) African American Literature II

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course will examine the major African American writers of the twentieth century, beginning with the poetry and prose of Paul Laurence Dunbar and ending with the fiction of Toni Morrison, John Wideman, and the poetry of Yusef Kourmankya, Rita Dove, and others. We will discuss the strategies involved in the creation of a "black voice" and its relationship to Anglo-American literature. We will also consider the nature of literary influence along with the attempts, by some writers, to create a distinct "black aesthetic." Finally, we will discuss the difficulties black authors encounter in asserting the literary over the sociological among readers of all intellectual and social strata.

(Fall) Harlem Renaissance

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

The course will study the literature, politics, and art of the Harlem Renaissance--roughly a period from 1915 to 1940. The New Negro Movement brought together writers, artists, philosophers, musicians, and everyday people from many parts of the United States and the Caribbean to New York City's Harlem. Their efforts to create a distinct African American art resulted in a flowering of art from several different perspectives. The era has most frequently been thought of as a 1920s-only phenomenon, and many have suggested that it was less a "renaissance" than a first flowering of a collective artistic spirit. We will energetically take on the debate.

(Spring) Introduction to Comparative Empires

(History 250)

This course probes the characteristics of imperial rule, as well as the differences between one empire and another. The course asks: What are empires, and what animates them - economic exploitation, power politics, and/or cultural commitments? How do empires impose and maintain their authority, and what is their impact on centers and provinces, and on elites and the common people? How do empires deal with the heterogeneous peoples, religions, races, and cultures they conquer and incorporate into their fold? Who is driven to resist imperial power, how do they resist, and what other forces lead empires to dissolve? Finally, what is the relation between empire and the modern nation state?

Prerequisites: so, jr or fy with permission of instructor

Notes: Gateway course for thematic minor on Comparative Empires.

(Fall) Literary Criticism and Theory

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

This course is designed to offer students a broad historical overview of literary theory as well as exposure to contemporary debates about "theory" and literary representation. The course is both an exercise in practical criticism and a survey of the Western critical tradition from Plato to Derrida.

Beginning with the question of why Plato wished to ban poets from his ideal Republic, the course will go on to consider such topics as the Classic vs. Romantic theories of the imagination, the "invention" of psychology and the necessary difficulty of much modern literature, the relation of gender and ethnicity to literary expression, and the uncertainties of literary interpretation.

(Spring) Writing Historical Fiction - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

Does historical fiction offer readers something history books cannot? What obligation does the writer of historical fiction have to the verifiable facts of the past? Is history a place we can visit, or is it a living force, defining the present? Isn't there a sense in which all fiction is historical fiction? In this course we'll consider these and other questions as we read and write historical fiction. We'll go out with our shovels and teaspoons to dig in the past, unearthing the psychological atmosphere, the gossip, the voices, and the important lies that will show us the way to breathe new life into the cold, dead facts of history.

(Spring) Studies in Journalism and Nonfiction: Narrative Nonfiction - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

This class is designed to immerse students in some of the most powerful nonfiction being published today. We will read extensively to explore the art of telling factual stories with drama, accuracy, imagination, and skill by examining works on topics ranging from business to science to history and politics. Outside the classroom students will be expected to apply these skills to their own writing through a series of assignments culminating in the production of one magazine-length work. Throughout, we will focus on challenges of structure, "voice," and sustaining a narrative. Our goal will be to produce work distinguished by simple, accurate, and compelling prose.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, English 202

(Fall) Studies in Journalism: Journalism History and Ethics: The Role and Function of the Fourth Estate - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

Can a story be accurate but false? Should reporters value protecting national security over telling the truth? Is it ethical to tell a lie if it allows access to important information? Journalists face difficult ethical dilemmas every day. But how do they know what to do? Are there rules? In this class we will study ethics in journalism from the time of the muckrakers to the rise of the blog.

(Fall) Old English

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

A study of the language and literature of Anglo-Saxon England (ca. 450-1066 AD) in a series of graduated grammar lessons and readings of Old English poetry and prose. These will include selections from the Bible, the Venerable Bede, the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, "The Wanderer," "The Dream of the Rood," "The Wife's Lament," and the Exeter Book riddles. We will also learn the 31-character Old English futhorx as it was preserved in "The Rune Poem" and used to inscribe verses on the Franks Casket and the Ruthwell Cross.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in department beyond English 101

Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement

Instructors: S. Harris

(Spring) Beowulf

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

An introduction to the epic poem Beowulf in its original language and in translation. Written between c. 750 and c.1000 CE, Beowulf is the chief poetic achievement of Anglo-Saxon England, a work of stunning artistry, complex structure, and ancient folk wisdom. Beowulf has inspired J. R. R. Tolkien and Seamus Heaney as well as numerous authors and translators today. Reading the poem closely, we will put it into its historical and literary contexts, imagining Anglo-Saxon readers as well as modern ones. A knowledge of the Old English language is preferred but not required.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in department beyond English 101

Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement

(Spring) Chaucer: The Canterbury Tales

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Known as a storyteller par excellence, Chaucer was also a famous reader of classical epic, romance, and philosophy. This research seminar will give students the opportunity to read the Canterbury Tales in light of the work's cultural, historical, and literary contexts. Throughout the semester, students will engage with Chaucer's tales and his favorite sources to examine and discuss his representations of gender and class, his perspectives on religious authority, his use of the English vernacular, and his commitment to poetry.

(Spring) Chaucer: Stories of Cupid's Martyrs - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Medieval Studies 300)

This course begins with a close reading of Chaucer's great love story Troilus and Criseyde together with The Legend of Good Women, taking into consideration the multiple cultural contexts a late medieval audience would have brought to both poems along with such topics as honour, love, trouthe and betrayal. We will conclude by comparing Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida with Chaucer's work as a way of understanding the continuities and changes between a late medieval and early modern understanding of men and women in love and war.

(Fall) Topics in Medieval Literature: Alliteration and the Medieval Poem - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Alliteration, Paul Fussell observes, is especially amenable to the poetry of the English language. In this course, we will ask how alliterative practices operate in medieval English verse, and what it means to encounter alliterative poetry as a mode of thought. To do so, we'll explore a variety of works through their religious, political, and philosophical contexts. By studying the partnership of poetic form and content, the rise and uses of medieval vernacularity, and the materiality of language, this course will explore what is entailed in an "alliterative tradition." Readings will include some Anglo-Saxon poetry, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, and Piers Plowman.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, English 200 and English 210 or 213

Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement

(Spring) Topics in Late Medieval Literature: The Matter of Britain: The Grail in Arthurian Myth

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Medieval Studies 300)

This course focuses on the various forms the story of the grail takes in Arthurian legends from the twelfth to the twentieth centuries in the literature of England, France, and Europe. Centered in medieval English versions of the Arthurian myth, the course considers the political and cultural forces that helped shape the grail legend after the fall of Jerusalem in 1187, and over the course of the later Middle Ages, into the twentieth century. Readings from Malory, Tennyson and contemporary fiction as well as chronicles and romances.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, Medieval Studies 101, or 8 credits in English or Medieval Studies and permission of instructor; online application required

Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement

ENGL-317-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Spring) Studies in Renaissance Literature: Early Modern Drama

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

English Renaissance drama is filled with meta-theatrical moments: disguises and dissimulation, confidence tricks, ceremonies, masques, and plays-within-the-play. Reading Shakespeare alongside his rivals and peers (Kyd, Marlowe, and Jonson, among others), this seminar examines how early modern theater meditates on the idea of theatricality. We will explore how questions of performance impinge on representations of decorum, desire, revenge, evil, power, and ideology. Plays will likely include Titus Andronicus, Doctor Faustus, The Alchemist, and The Duchess of Malfi.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in department beyond English 101 or permission of instructor

Notes: meets English department pre-1700 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement

(Fall) Seminar in Victorian Poetry and Prose: Sensational Victorians

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive)

In Tennyson's poetry of sensation, the shocking fictions of Collins and Braddon, and the sensually charged poetry of D.G. Rossetti and Swinburne, literary sensations became a nexus for Victorian anxieties about the embodied effects of literary form. This course investigates how authors deployed sensation in poetry and prose as they drew on emergent scientific discourses on disease and madness, ruptured barriers between high and low cultural forms, and blurred categories of class and gender to question the role of aesthetic labor in Victorian culture. Other readings will include texts by Trollope, Dickens, and James, as well as supplementary readings in literary criticism and theory.

(Spring) Seminar in Victorian Poetry and Prose: George Eliot

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

When George Eliot's first stories were published, Charles Dickens wrote, "The exquisite truth and delicacy both of the humor and the pathos of these stories, I have never seen the like of." Decades later, Virginia Woolf called Middlemarch "one of the few English novels written for grown-up people." In her letters, Eliot said she wanted to change what the novel could do. Her novels are concerned with the mysterious and mundane, with the force of culture and history, and with the reverberations that move through the world from individual to individual. We will read some of her major works, including Adam Bede, Middlemarch, and Daniel Deronda, as well as some of her essays, influences, and historical and critical contexts.

(Fall) The Victorian Novel: Realism - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Gender Studies 333F-08)

This course will explore the project of Realism in the Victorian novel, watching tensions between a desire for guidance and a desire for mimesis. One critic has said the Victorians brought a sense of social duty to Romantic world-awareness, creating a "duty of awareness" that was almost overwhelming for the novelist and novel. We will explore this "duty of awareness" as we investigate representations of gender, class, and feeling as structuring principles in the novel. Novelists may include Austen, Dickens, G. Eliot, Gaskell, C. Bronte, W. Collins, and Hardy. Supplementary readings in literary criticism and theory.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in department including English 220, 230, 236, or permission of instructor

Notes: meets English department 1700-1900 requirement

Instructors: J. Pyke

Expected enrollment: 18

ENGL-325-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Fall) Victorian Literature and Visual Culture

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course will examine literary texts that represent new forms of visuality in nineteenth-century Britain as well as examples of visual culture that provide a framework for reading Victorian culture in innovative ways. We will study nineteenth-century photography--portraiture, prison photography, imperial photographs, and private and popular erotic images--as well as novels and autobiographical writing that engage with new photographic technology and its transformation of the ways in which Victorians understood identity, politics, aesthetics, and representation. The course will take a similar approach to painting, literary illustration, political cartoons and caricature, and advertising.

(Fall) Seminar in the Literature of the Romantic Period: William Wordsworth

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

William Wordsworth lived through a time of revolutions and world wars: the American Revolution, the French Revolution, the Haitian Revolution, the rise and fall of Napoleon, wars of independence and of imperial conquest, and, behind it all the social transformations arising from the industrial revolution. As Wordsworth wrestled with how to adapt his art to these new realities, he introduced dramatically new content and experimented with a startling variety of poetic forms, styles, and techniques. In the end his main subject became the question of how individual identity is formed. This course will be an introduction to Wordsworth's poetry, showing why he is the first and greatest modern English poet.

(Fall) Seminar in the Literature of the Romantic Period: Jane Austen

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Jane Austen's work stands almost as its own subgenre in the evolution of the novel. Happening at a moment of transitions, her work can be read formally as a bridge between the experiments of eighteenth century realism and what was just to come in the Victorian novel. Although she is often admired for her humor and satire around marriage and sex, the novels also engage with aesthetics, epistemology, and sensibility: political ideas about what constitutes beauty, what it means to know something, and how much one should feel. We will read the completed novels, some of her influences and contemporaries, and critical and theoretical contexts.

(Spring) The Modern English Novel: D. H. Lawrence and Virginia Woolf

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

A study of the modernist movement in Britain in the early twentieth century, with the focus on the fiction and nonfiction writings of D.H. Lawrence and Virginia Woolf. Readings will include Lawrence's Sons and Lovers, The Rainbow, and Women in Love; Woolf's Mrs. Dalloway, To the Lighthouse, and The Waves. Readings will also include critical essays by each author as well as brief critical biographies and selected secondary criticism.

(Spring) Seminar in Modern Poetry: Hilda Doolittle, T. S. Eliot, Ezra Pound, and Mina Loy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course will chart the development of Modernist poetics from its origins at the beginning of the twentieth century to the publication of The Waste Land in 1922. We will focus on four poets (Hilda Doolittle, T. S. Eliot, Mina Loy, and Ezra Pound) and will chart the ways in which they interact with one another to produce experimental poetry of extraordinary force.

Prerequisites: jr, sr; 8 credits in department including English 200; preference will be given to students who have taken English 235 or English 245

(Spring) Asian American Fiction, Nonfiction, and Film: After the Asian American Model Minority

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive)

At the height of the civil rights movement, a U.S. News and World Report article pronounced Japanese Americans as the "model minority." Since then the stereotype has reduced Asian American life to studiousness, academic achievement, and upward mobility. Its prevalence has often obscured our ability to understand contemporary forms of Asian racialization, from the 1992 "Honor Roll Murder" to the 1999 espionage case against Wen Ho Lee. Examining literature and film, we will consider the myth's representation as an extension of prior anti-Asian racism or a break from the past. Authors may include Amy Chua, Susan Choi, Vincent Lam, and Chang-rae Lee. Films may include Better Luck Tomorrow and Crash.

(Theatre Arts 350)

This course will move from April 1865, when Lincoln was assassinated in a Washington theater while laughing at a hugely successful British comedy, to the present day, when revivals of the classic American playtexts grace major theaters in London. We shall follow the emergence of a distinctively national drama, responding to British precedents initially, and more recently incorporating further diverse, even international, perspectives. Playwrights studied include Susan Glaspell, Langston Hughes, Eugene O'Neill, Edward Albee, Miguel Piñero, August Wilson, David Mamet, Suzan-Lori Parks, David Henry Hwang, Lynn Nottage, and Will Eno.

(Fall) Modern Urban British Novel - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

As London and the British novel enter the new millennium, both are sites of competing histories, traditions, and agendas. This course will map the city's progress from the center of an empire to a node in the global world's economy, and chart the twentieth-century novel's movement from realism to postmodernism and beyond. Beginning by contrasting the realist London of Conan Doyle's Sherlock Holmes with Virginia Woolf's modernist version in Mrs. Dalloway, we will go on to trace the development of the post-1945 British novel.

(Fall) Emily Dickinson in Her Times

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement
(Gender Studies 333A)

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics from areas emphasized in the department according to needs of particular students. Study in small groups or by individuals.

This course will examine the writing of Emily Dickinson, both her poetry and her letters. We will consider the cultural, historical, political, religious, and familial environment in which she lived. Special attention will be paid to Dickinson's place as a woman artist in the nineteenth century. The class will meet at the Dickinson Museum (280 Main Street in Amherst and accessible by Five College bus). Enrollment is limited to ten students.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in English or 8 credits in Gender Studies

Notes: 1 meeting (3 hours) in Amherst

(Spring) Nature and Gender: Representations of Women and Nature in American Literature (Nineteenth-Twentieth Century)

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement
(Gender Studies 333 and Environmental Studies 373)

This course will focus on portrayals of women in nineteenth through mid-twentieth century America, particularly in the context of nature and landscape. We will explore how women, often objectified in visual images of the period, appropriated established devices or developed new images and structures to represent womanhood in their own terms. Texts will include selected poetry, sketches, autobiographical essays or memoirs, short stories, novels, paintings, films, and photography.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits from the department or permission of instructor

Notes: meets English department 1700-1900 requirement; meets English department seminar requirement

(Spring) Hitchcock and After - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement
(Film Studies 320)

This course will examine the films of Alfred Hitchcock and the afterlife of Hitchcock in contemporary U.S. culture. We will interpret Hitchcock films in a variety of theoretical frames, including feminist and queer theories, and in historical contexts including the Cold War. We will also devote substantial attention to the legacy of Hitchcock in remakes, imitations, and parodies. Hitchcock films may include Spellbound, Strangers on a Train, Rear Window, Vertigo, North by Northwest, Psycho, The Man Who Knew Too Much, Mamie, and The Birds; additional works by Brooks, Craven, De Palma, and Sherman. Readings in film and cultural theory; screenings at least weekly.

(Spring) Explorations in Cultural Semantics

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Anthropology 318)

Where does meaning come from, how does it work? Do different forms of expression (verbal, visual, auditory, or tactile) involve different ways of referring, of claiming what a message is about? Where do I locate the differences, how can I describe them? This class offers an introduction to key concepts in the study of meaning with a particular emphasis on narrative theory. We will take a closer look at the similarities and differences in the construction of "the story," in literature, history, myth, and other types of claims from very different historical (ancient, medieval, or modern) and cultural (European, Aboriginal Australian, and Native American) settings.

Prerequisites: so, jr, sr. Anthropology 230, 12 credits in department or permission of instructor. Introductory course in linguistic anthropology or equivalent is required.

ENGL-383-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Fall) Just Joyce

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Seminar on Joyce's major texts excluding Finnegan's Wake. Beginning with Dubliners, the seminar will consider recent trends in critical theory as they pertain to Joyce's work. Half the semester will be spent on a careful reading of Ulysses. Students will be responsible for seminar reports as well as a midterm paper (7-10 pages) and a final paper (15-20 pages).

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in department including English 200, or permission of instructor; English 230 and English 280 highly recommended

Notes: meets English department seminar requirement

Instructors: W. Quillian

Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-386-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Fall) George Eliot, Virginia Woolf, and Doris Lessing - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Gender Studies 333f(06))

This seminar will focus on major works of fiction by these three writers and will be particularly concerned with their response to the social and cultural worlds around them. Considering each as a major voice for the concerns of women of her time, the course will examine their critical and theoretical prose as well as their fiction.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in department including English 200, or permission of instructor; English 220, 280 highly recommended

Notes: meets English department seminar requirement

Instructors: W. Quillian

Expected enrollment: 15

ENGL-387-01 - English - 2012-2013

(Fall) Re-imagining Los Angeles: Multiethnic Fictions of Tomorrowland - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

In Ridley Scott's 1982 science fiction film, Blade Runner, Los Angeles is a beleaguered metropolis overrun by immigrant "hordes" and menacing replicants, presenting a dystopic forecast of multiculturalism. By surveying major genres in relation to the racialized and gendered contexts of migration, labor, and urban redevelopment, this course focuses on alternative constructions of Los Angeles in African American, Asian American, and Chicana/o short stories, novels, and film. Works will include Southland, Tropic of Orange, Twilight: Los Angeles 1992, Their Dogs Came with Them, Devil in a Blue Dress, We Should Never Meet, and Kindred.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, or permission of instructor

Notes: meets English department seminar requirement

Environmental Studies

ENVST-100-01 - Environmental Studies - 2012-2013

(Spring) Introduction to Environmental Studies

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course introduces students to the field of environmental studies and to some of the scientific, historical, political, economic and cultural aspects of environmental concerns. Through interdisciplinary lenses, we explore the complexities of many issues and problems such as climate change, threats to biodiversity, and toxic environments. In addition to fostering an understanding of their origins, the course focuses on potential solutions.

ENVST-101-01 - Environmental Studies - 2012-2013

(Fall) "Are We Modern Yet?" Introduction to the Histories and Theories of Development

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

What is so compelling about the idea of development? Why does it fail much of the global south? Do colonialism and capitalism have anything to do with it? Why do hunger, poverty, inequality, unemployment, and ecological crises persist in the so-called developed world? What are the parameters of the proposed solutions to underdevelopment such as neoliberal market reforms versus those of alternative models? What are the connections between development and environmental issues? development and war? Can development be sustainable? Are gender and race incidental or central to these issues? This course engages these questions through readings, lectures, discussions, and writing assignments.

(Spring) Renewable Energy

(Physics 104)

We will examine the feasibility of converting the entire energy infrastructure of the US from one that is dependent on fossil fuels to one that utilizes mostly renewable sources of energy. We will examine the potential scale of energy production and the associated costs, natural resource requirements and land usage needs for both renewables, such as solar, wind and biofuel, and non-renewables, such as coal, natural gas, petroleum and nuclear. By applying extensive use of basic algebra and an elementary understanding of the physical processes underpinning each energy technology, we will arrive at a number of urgent conclusions about the challenges facing our energy infrastructure.

ENVST-200-01 - Environmental Studies - 2012-2013

(Fall) Environmental Science

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

Most of the environmental challenges we face are complex and interdisciplinary in nature. This course introduces students to the scientific principles, concepts, and methodologies required to both understand the interrelationships of the natural world, as well as to identify and analyze environmental problems and think critically about alternative solutions for addressing them. Key concepts from ecology, biogeochemistry, and other scientific fields inform our study of climate change, water resources, soil sustainability, food production, and other topics. Fundamental and emerging issues are examined using regional case studies, hands-on problem solving, and field and laboratory experiments.

Prerequisites: One 100-level lab science; one course in statistics is recommended

(Fall) Political Ecology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course will explore the historical, political, economic, social, and cultural contexts in which human-environment interactions occur. We will cover critical topics and trends in the field of political ecology, from its early manifestations to more recent expansions. Using case studies from the global south and north, we will discuss factors that shape social and environmental change across scales from the personal to the global, and we will examine the role of gender, race, class, and power in struggles over resources. Students will become familiar with the academic debates in which political ecologists are engaged, and they will apply the concepts discussed in a case of their choice.

(Fall) Evolution of North American Landscapes

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Earth's landscapes have changed dramatically over the planet's long history. In this course we tour North America and explore the origin and anatomy of its landscapes, including national parks and monuments. We also consider how geologic setting or physical environment has influenced human exploration and settlement of the continent. By "reading" the land we can recognize the complex layering of natural and cultural histories that creates what is experienced as "sense of place." Reading the land can also provide a clearer sense of how various peoples have used and shaped Earth's surface differently, and how these differences have contributed to a spectrum of environmental impacts.

Prerequisites: permission of instructor. High school earth science or 4 credits in geology recommended.

ENVST-240-01 - Environmental Studies - 2012-2013

(Fall) The Value of Nature - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Through this seminar, students develop an in-depth knowledge of and articulate vocabulary for the significant and diverse ways that humans value the natural world - utilitarian, scientific, aesthetic, naturalistic, symbolic, ethical, and spiritual. We use these different typologies of human environmental values as frameworks for readings and discussion, extending our examination to historical and cultural variations in values, competing perspectives of the natural world, and other value concepts, including intrinsic and transformative value. We examine the concept of biophilia and probe the role values play in the concern over losses of biological diversity and its implications.

Prerequisites: Environmental Studies 100

(Spring) Environmental Issues

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

In this course, we will explore the different facets of numerous environmental policy issues and review the substantive aspects, legal themes, and regulatory structure of the major federal environmental laws. The laws covered in this course include the National Environmental Policy Act, the Clean Air Act, the Clean Water Act, the Endangered Species Act, and others. The course objectives are for the student to learn the basic regulatory characteristics of the major laws and to become well-versed in the current environmental issues which we will focus upon throughout the semester, such as global climate change, ocean degradation, energy resources, and biodiversity loss.

Prerequisites: Environmental Studies 100

(Fall) Reading and Writing in the World

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive; English 267)

An introduction to reading and writing about nature, this seminar will attempt an exchange across distinct approaches to observing and describing the world around us. Do lenses of culture, discipline, and gender determine how we see and experience nature, environment, and place? Course work will include reading such authors as N. Scott Momaday, Henry David Thoreau, bell hooks, Leslie Marmon Silko, Mary Oliver, Terry Tempest Williams, Wendell Berry, and Annie Dillard; field trips; and writing assignments--weekly field notes and journals, analytical papers, and personal essays.

(Fall) Qualitative Research Methods in Environmental Studies

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

The course is designed for upper level students interested in conducting independent or honors thesis qualitative research on environmental issues. We will discuss the logic of qualitative social research and examine a range of methods, considering the specific advantages (and limitations) of different techniques. Students will also discuss ethical issues, including the challenges of conducting research in cross-cultural settings, and they will prepare institutional review board proposals. This is a hands-on course in which each student will pick a research topic of interest (on an environment-society problem) and then share and discuss weekly assignments in class. Students from a variety of disciplines are welcome.

Prerequisites: 8 credits of 200-level social science or humanities and permission of instructor.

(Spring) Restoration Ecology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

One test of our ecological knowledge is whether we can successfully apply it to create or restore ecosystems that have been damaged or destroyed. As we take on the role of restoration ecologists this semester, we will use principles and methods of ecology, conservation biology, hydrology, soil science, and related disciplines to learn about the theory, practice, and politics of ecosystem restoration. This course emphasizes fieldwork, interdisciplinary teamwork, and ecological planning to evaluate and design restoration projects in our surrounding communities and regional landscapes.

Prerequisites: Environmental Science 200 and/or one semester of landscape architecture, ecology, biology, or geology

Instructors: K. Ballantine

(Spring) Perspectives on American Environmental History - *Not offered this year/term

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

We explore the history of human-environment interactions in North America from precolonial times to the present from different cultural perspectives. How have such human activities as migration, colonization, and resource use depended on or modified the natural world? How have different cultural perceptions of and attitudes toward environment shifted through time and helped to reshape American landscapes? Case studies include ecological histories of Native America and Euro-America, slavery and land use, wilderness and conservation, and environmental racism and social justice. Our approach entails historical review of scientific studies, literature, visual records, and oral tradition.

(Fall) Conference Courses in Environmental Studies: Environmental Justice and American Literature

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Community-based learning course; Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics in areas of environmental interest, determined by faculty expertise and student needs. Study in small groups or by individual students working with faculty.

As environmental justice scholars such as Vandana Shiva and Robert Bullard have explained, people of color, the poor, and women suffer disproportionately from ecological crisis. This course will study literary works grounded in this material reality of simultaneous ecological and human devastation specific to U.S. minority groups and raise questions about the power of literature to document, illustrate, arouse, and instruct in the face of environmental crisis. Topics will include ecofeminism, environmental racism, urban ecology and planning, sexuality and environment, and U.S. environmental imperialism. We will read critical theory alongside poetry and prose from a diverse range of nineteenth- and twentieth-century American writers.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, or permission of instructor

(Spring) Conference Courses in Environmental Studies: Food Justice: Literature, Art, and Activism

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Community-based learning course; Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): Selected topics in areas of environmental interest, determined by faculty expertise and student needs. Study in small groups or by individual students working with faculty.

In a world of diminishing resources, the complex balance of the global food supply calls into question issues of justice and human values. Why is it that certain groups of people suffer disproportionately from food scarcity and contamination? How do we ensure affordable, nutritious, and culturally appropriate food for all in the face of overconsumption, climate change, and population growth? We will study a diverse range of contemporary media as we engage in critical discussion of the production, distribution, and consumption of food. Topics will include food sovereignty and security; food disparities related to race, class and gender; animal liberation; and new food technologies.

(Spring) Photography and Landscape: Earth As Visual Text - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Our understanding of the world around us is deeply influenced by the visual images created in response to human experience of nature. This course explores photography as a way of seeing and interpreting landscape and environment through time. Projects allow students to examine visual elements of landscape, develop photographic techniques, and create photo-narratives of their own. Using readings, observations, and photographs we consider how cultural and environmental issues and insights are communicated through photographic media. Basic understanding of photography and access to a camera are required.

(Spring) Landscape and Narrative - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Different stories or narratives--whether myth, literature, maps, or scientific theory--have been created about every region or environment on Earth as human attempts to describe and understand our connections with that place. How do braided strands of human history and natural history contribute to stories we tell of the land, and to stories we tell of ourselves in the land and of relational identity? In this reading and writing seminar we will reflect on how lifeways, homeplace, and identity of an individual or a community are linked with environment or the land. We will also create written and visual narratives of our own and explore creative environmental writing in reflection and action.

(Spring) Environmentalism and "The Market:" Evolving Strategies for Conservation - *Not offered this year/term

This course focuses on the relationship between global political economy and environmentalism. Drawing on a range of literature, we will reflect on changing perceptions of and strategies related to "the market" in environmental policy. We will consider the political, economic, social and ecological influences and impacts of changing ideas and associated environmental practices, with particular attention to programs such as payments for ecosystem services, ecotourism and green buying, corporate social responsibility, water privatization, carbon markets, and wildlife derivatives. Throughout the course, we will explore issues of equity, wealth and governance related to these new market-based approaches to environmental conservation.

(Spring) Science and Power in Environmental Governance

This course applies concepts from political ecology to study how governance, broadly defined, works in relation to the environment. Using case studies of international environmental issues, we will explore how people make decisions about the environment in a policy realm. We will discuss the role of various agents, such as governments, scientific bodies, and nongovernmental organizations, in the decision-making process. We will reflect on who has access to decisions; how scientific data is used; how environmental ideas become powerful; and how policies are legitimated. Armed with this information, we will consider how to advocate for global environmental sustainability and social equity.

(Spring) Nature and Gender: Representations of Women and Nature in American Literature (Nineteenth-Twentieth Century)

(English 373)

This course will focus on portrayals of women in nineteenth through mid-twentieth century America, particularly in the context of nature and landscape. We will explore how women, often objectified in visual images of the period, appropriated established devices or developed new images and structures to represent womanhood in their own terms. Texts will include selected poetry, sketches, autobiographical essays or memoirs, short stories, novels, paintings, films, and photography.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; German Studies 323)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course examines the cultural, political and social developments from 1800 to the present by investigating a significant topic. The selection of materials is exemplary rather than comprehensive and is based on thematic, historical, generic and other units.

The "long nineteenth century," with the political explosion of the French Revolution and scientific explosion of the steam engine, burst into modernity, defining itself and the "short twentieth century" in manifold areas: science, economics, politics, art, literature, education. Controversial values are attributed to concepts like secularization, nation-building, industrialization, and democratization. We will analyze representations in film and text of such discoveries and visions, e.g., in bacteriology, environmentalism, political and social upheaval, the concept of a democratic nation state, Marx's theories; Bismarck's German unification, the social-security system; and women's movements.

Prerequisites: Previous study of German

Notes: Students enrolled in 223 are expected to enroll in the complementary two-credit tutorial (German Studies 224). The 224 tutorial will stress film visions by women directors along with working on revising written work from 223.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Days of Heaven: The Cinema of Terrence Malick

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)

This course will examine the work of contemporary American filmmaker Terrence Malick. While taking into account technical aspects (cinematography, music), ours will be a largely thematic discussion, looking at recurring themes such as good vs. evil, nature vs. culture and spirituality. Selected critical essays will deepen our conversation and reveal some of the myriad literary, philosophical and theological texts that serve as the conceptual underpinnings of Malick's films. We will also discuss why these films, especially The Tree of Life (2011), have proved so polarizing, provoking intense and vehement reactions, both positive and negative, on the part of spectators around the world.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive; History 101)

This course will concentrate on the relationship between Bollywood (or the Bombay Film Industry) and history. How do Bollywood films produce the past? What historical moments are they interested in capturing? How do these images and narratives compare to those produced by historians? The purpose of this course is to introduce students to South Asian history, to challenge them to think critically about film production, and to test and strengthen their writing skills.

(Fall) Production Seminar in the Moving Image: Experiments In Adaptation: Beginning Video Production

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course provides a foundation in the principles, techniques, and equipment involved in making short videos. Working with already existing texts, students will develop their own projects. The course will introduce the following: developing a project idea from a pre-existing text; script/treatment writing; aesthetics and mechanics of shooting; the role of sound; and the conceptual and technical underpinnings of digital editing. By translating other media into cinematic terms, we will develop our proficiency in the language of moving images.

Prerequisites: Film Studies 201, application and permission of instructor. Application available through Film Studies website.

(Fall) Special Topics in Film Studies: American Gothic

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(English 243f (01))

(Film Studies Component Course.) An examination of the gothic--a world of fear, haunting, claustrophobia, paranoia, and monstrosity--in American literature and culture, with an emphasis upon issues of race and gender. Topics include the gothic; gothic sexuality; Southern, Northern, and national gothic; freakishness and grotesquerie; and visual gothic. Focus on fiction, with some film and photography. Authors, filmmakers, and artists may include Alcott, Arbus, Browning, Crane, Dunbar, Dunn, Elmer, Faulkner, Gilman, Hitchcock, Kubrick, McCullers, Morrison, O'Connor, Oates, Parks, Poe, Romero, Turner, and Wood.

Prerequisites: so, jr, sr, English 240 or 241 recommended

(Spring) Special Topics in Film Studies: The Moving Image in Contemporary Art

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Art History 290)

This course will survey the rise of the motion picture as both subject and mode in art since 1960. The development of video art, from monitor and installation to projection and flat screen, opened up new channels for performance and sculpture. But the rising presence of 16mm film in galleries (Tacita Dean) as celluloid disappears from movie theaters amplifies a trend that also includes artists as feature filmmakers (Julian Schnabel and Cindy Sherman), Christian Marclay's use of cinema's past in The Clock (2010), and Matthew Barney's reliance on the Guggenheim as set and cinematheque.

Prerequisites: Film Studies 201 or 202

Instructors: K. Eisenstein

(Fall) Special Topics in Film Studies: Music and Film

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Music 220)

For all who stay to the end of the credits, purchase soundtracks, and argue over who should have won the Oscar for Best Score, along with anyone else interested in the undervalued importance of music to the general effect of a motion picture, this course will explore and discuss the myriad ways in which these two media interact. The course will focus on classic scores by Herrmann, Morricone, and Williams, as well as the uses of existing music in films of Bergman and Kubrick.

Prerequisites: See Music 220; permission of instructor required for registration in Film Studies 220.

(Spring) Special Topics in Film Studies: Religion and Film

(Religion 213)

This course is an investigation of the intersections between film and religion. In it, we will examine how the cultural phenomenon of religion is represented in film and how religion, understood critically and theoretically, can be a useful means to interpret film. We will learn the basic issues inherent in the interpretation of this art form (e.g., How do the visual, aural, and narrative components of film work together to create meaning?), and we will critically investigate the concept of religion as a means to better understanding the significance of cultural practice (e.g., What is religion? What are the myriad ways it is made manifest in culture?).

(Fall) Special Topics in Film Studies: Transforming Visions: Homage to German Women Filmmakers

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Taught in English; German Studies 231f-02)

Focus on the discussion and analysis of films by German women directors from Lotte Reiniger, pioneer of animation films, and Leni Riefenstahl, controversial director and mythmaker of the Third Reich, to such trailblazing women directors of the New German Cinema as Margarethe von Trotta, Jutta Brückner, and Helma Sanders-Brahms. Moreover, we will attempt to determine whether more recent women directors like Doris Dörrie or Caroline Link, including those of migration background like Yasemin Samdereli, developed special (trans)gendered and transnational gazes that led them to focus so frequently on variations of (tragi)comedy in film.

(Spring) Special Topics in Film Studies: Advanced Russian Film and Literature - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Russian and Eurasian Studies 252)

Students will view films, read excerpts from Soviet and Russian prose about childhood and coming of age, and study the socio-cultural aspects of becoming an adult in Russia. Films will include: Ivan's Childhood, The Scarecrow, The Thief, and The Return. Readings will include literary texts and film reviews. We will continue to work on oral and writing skills, and vocabulary. This course prepares students to express opinions, ideas, points of view, and critiques on films, social issues and cultural phenomena using more complex and rich language.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; German Studies 223)

(In German) This seminar explores the remembrance of the Holocaust as represented primarily, but not solely, in German and European films from the immediate postwar era to the present, including documentary and feature film, as well as in other forms of visual media, such as television, photographs, and art. Themes include the working through of the past, expressions of guilt, remorse and sorrow, and the relationship between art and politics as exemplified in attempts to understand the causes, motives, and consequences of the Holocaust. Films include Night and Fog, Sboah, Schindler's List, Gebürtig, The Night Porter, Life is Beautiful, The Nasty Girl, Wannsee Conference and others.

Prerequisites: See German Studies 223. Previous study of German

(Fall) History of World Cinema: The First 100 Years (1832-1932)

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

In this historical survey we will study three periods from the first half of the cinema's past (1832-1932): its invention, its silent days, and its transition to sound. From the optical effect of the phenakistoscope (1832) through the efforts of Edison and Lumière, from the evolution of the classical style of Hollywood to the montage theories of the Soviets, from the adoption of sound-on-film to the benshi strikes in Japan, this course will introduce students to the fascinating figures, institutional structures, art and technologies that built the world's cinema.

(Fall) Film Genre: Film Genre and Gender - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Gender Studies 204f-01)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific film genre. Some examples of genres that might be studied are: the science fiction, horror, melodrama, musical, Western, detective, or gangster film.

This course examines the development of Hollywood film genres largely in the post-studio era, particularly the Western, the Melodrama, the Science Fiction and Horror film, and film noir. We will consider the evolution of these four genres in relation to changes in the film industry and in American society, especially in relation to gender.

(Spring) Film Genre: The Musical Film - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific film genre. Some examples of genres that might be studied are: the science fiction, horror, melodrama, musical, Western, detective, or gangster film.

This course explores the American musical film from its first appearance in the early 1930s in the films of Busby Berkeley to its recent revival in films such as Baz Luhrmann's Moulin Rouge. The course also examines musical films from other national cinemas that either comment self-reflexively on the genre and its American context and/or expand common definitions of the genre.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; GERM 231)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to the cinema of a single country or group of countries. Some examples that might be studied are: French cinema, Francophone cinema, Indian cinema, Eastern European cinema, or Latin American cinema.

A study of such representative films from Germany's "Golden Age" as Wiene's Expressionist film noir, The Cabinet of Dr. Caligari, Lang's sci-fi classic, Metropolis, and psycho-thriller, M., Murnau's Dracula film, Nosferatu, and Pabst's prostitution study, Joyless Street. Emphasis on investigating historical and sociological background; influence of Expressionist theater; advent of sound; the "New Woman"; genesis of horror, action, and utopian film; influence on New German Cinema and contemporary popular culture. Includes such "remakes" as Herzog's Nosferatu, the 2002 anime Metropolis, and music videos by Queen, Madonna, Lady Gaga. Includes discussion with specialists and students in the U.S. and Germany.

(Spring) Film Authorship: Cinephilia and the Auteur--Forests and Trees - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific cinematic author. While most courses focus on a director or group of directors, courses may also focus on designers, technicians, performers, producers, or some combination of these personnel.

In his review of Bitter Victory (1958), Jean-Luc Godard declared: "the cinema is Nicholas Ray." In his study The American Cinema: Directors and Directions 1929-1968, Andrew Sarris placed Ray just beneath the "Pantheon Directors" in a lovely named but secondary grouping he called "The Far Side of Paradise." This course will dive into this fascinating period of film criticism and cinephilia (the 1950s and 1960s). By examining the French response (Andre Bazin and Cahiers) to the American cinema (mainly of the 1940s and 1950s), and by looking at the films of directors like Ray, Howard Hawks, and Fritz Lang, we will explore the French influence on American and British critics.

(Fall) Film Theory: Feminist and Queer Theory through Film

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Gender Studies 221B-01)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a consideration of one or more of the methods through which the medium of film is understood aesthetically and/or culturally.

We will be reading a number of key feminist texts that theorize the construction of sexual difference, and challenge the oppression of women. We will then address queer theory, an offshoot and expansion of feminist theory, and study how it is both embedded in, and redefines, the feminist paradigms. This redefinition occurs roughly at the same time (1980s/90s) when race emerges as one of feminism's prominent blind spots. We will study these shifts through the analysis of a few moving pictures, or, to put it differently: all you always wanted to know about feminism, but didn't think to ask filmmakers such as Almodóvar, Hitchcock, Jarman, Pasolini, Varda, and others.

(Spring) Film Theory: Philosophy and Film Theory - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Philosophy 275-01)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a consideration of one or more of the methods through which the medium of film is understood aesthetically and/or culturally.

An exploration of philosophical issues encountered in the study of film. Why do we need a theory of film? What is a film anyway? Do films have "authors"? How do films engage our emotions? Can films be socially critical? What can we learn from films? These are examples of the topics to be discussed in this course as we investigate the nature of film and its relation to philosophy. There will be weekly required film screenings.

(Spring) Production Seminar: Documentary Workshop: Advanced Video Production

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Community-based learning course)

Preamble (for topics courses): An advanced course in the theory and practice of film/video production as an art form. Topics for the seminar will vary from year to year.

In this class, we will take skills and insights gained in introductory production courses and develop them over the length of the semester through the creation of one short documentary project, 10 minutes long. We will explore the ethical questions and ambivalence inherent in this medium, seeking complex answers to difficult questions about representation and the often blurry lines between fiction and non-fiction. We will watch documentaries each week, films that introduce us to new ideas and information both in their content and in their form. This course has a Community-Based Learning Component.

Prerequisites: Beginning video production or its equivalent. Application and permission of instructor required. Application available through Film Studies Web site.

Notes: 1 meeting (3 hours), 1 screening (2 hours); a lab fee may be charged.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Community-based learning course; Anthropology 310f-01)

In this course we go behind the scenes and behind the screens of anthropological films, museum exhibitions, "small media" events such as television, and publications such as National Geographic Magazine, to explore the social contexts of image production, distribution, and interpretation. Focusing on visual activism and ethics, we consider how popular portrayals of our own society and of others' both shape and are shaped by hierarchies of value in the material world. Finally, we leave the walls of the classroom to produce home movies of places which others call home - workplaces, temporary shelters, artistic environments, and so forth.

(French 311-01)

Focusing on late eighteenth- and nineteenth-century French novels, we will explore the historical and cultural background of a decadent French aristocracy and witness the triumph of the bourgeoisie. As visual resources we will use paintings by Boucher, Fragonard, Ingres, Delacroix, Courbet, Manet, Degas, as well as cinematic interpretations of Laclos' Les Liaisons dangereuses, Diderot's La Religieuse, and literary works by George Sand, Stendhal, Balzac, Flaubert, Zola, and Maupassant. Literacy in technology is an integral part of this course, and students will learn to produce a digital narration in iMovie as a term project.

(Fall) Seminar in Film Studies: Montage: Millimeters or Miles - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

Hollis Frampton claimed that it was "from [Eisenstein's] montage that we, all of us, measure our distances, in millimeters or in miles." Frampton's "all" extends beyond those directly involved with the cinema, echoing Eisenstein who stated that he was "interested in everything besides…the cinema," and who once began an essay with this epigraph from Goethe: "In nature we never see anything isolated, but everything in connection with something else which is before it, beside it, under it, and over it." This seminar will focus on Eisenstein's films and writings, pursuing their reverberations in Hollywood (e.g., Lang, Sirk) and the avant-garde (e.g., Brakhage, Sonbert, Child).

(Spring) Seminar in Film Studies: Theatre on Film/Film on Theatre - *Not offered this year/term

(Theatre Arts 350s(01))

For over a century, the relationship between stage and screen has been mutually defining. From the early influence of melodrama on cinematic form to contemporary experimental performance practices, theatre and film have sustained a rich, ongoing dialogue. With this in mind, we will study films that engage with theatricality as well as stage work that embraces cinematic sensibilities. Course materials include a broad selection of films in various genres as well as theoretical readings and a selection of plays. A special section of the course will be devoted to Shakespeare on film. Required weekly screenings will be complemented by attendance at live theatre performances.

Prerequisites: Film Studies 201 or permission of instructor.

(Fall) Topics in Experimental Film: Home Movies - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): This topics course provides advanced instruction in an aspect of film history, theory, or criticism. Students are expected to bring substantial background in the study of film to this course; enrollment may be limited.

This course examines that strain of the American Avant-Garde that finds its raw material in the domestic and quotidian world of everyday life, which it shapes through various, often highly complex editing practices. The theoretical work for the course is centered on the notion of duration; some of the filmmakers to be considered include: Stan Brakhage, Marie Menken, Marjorie Keller, and Peggy Ahwesh.

(Gender Studies 333s)

Preamble (for topics courses): This topics course provides advanced instruction in an aspect of film history, theory, or criticism. Students are expected to bring substantial background in the study of film to this course; enrollment may be limited.

This seminar examines experimental cinema made by women from the early 1950s, during the earliest years of the movement known as the American Avant-Garde, through the 1990s. While the class will read feminist film theory and see the work of such well-known filmmakers as Yvonne Rainer, Sally Potter, and Chantal Akerman, we will also examine the less familiar but highly influential films of women working in the home movie or diary mode, with particular emphasis on the work of Marie Menken.

(Spring) Film Genre: Expired Horror?

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific film genre. Some examples of genres that might be studied are: the science fiction, horror, melodrama, musical, Western, detective, or gangster film.

The horror film stands at the core of the body genres; however, in 2013 it may be hard for us to experience visceral impact from films made at a time that, in some ways, looked so different from our own. This course will survey the genre from 1896 to 1968, the year that the rating system was introduced in the United States. Yet our scope will be international, tackling not only Hollywood's Universal Horror, but the UK's Hammer Horror, Mexican Horror, Les yeux sans visage (1960), Italy's Mario Bava, and precursors to J-Horror.

Prerequisites: Film Studies 201 or 202

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Art History 360)

How are we to respond to Indian popular film, which is notorious for its distracting song and dance numbers, meandering story line, and visually overblown spectacles? This seminar will develop historical and theoretical approaches to Indian films as what scholar Lalitha Gopalan calls a "constellation of interruptions." Students will examine feature films in class, write critical papers on scholarly essays, and pursue independent research projects on various aspects of Indian film.

(Spring) Topics in National/Transnational Cinemas: Race and Representation in Latina/o Film

(Latin American Studies 387s (03))

(In English)This seminar offers an interrogation of the ways in which Latinas and Latinos are represented in the cinema. We will explore early portrayals of Latinas and Latinos in film history and then move onto contemporary cinema with a focus on race, class, gender and sexuality in these representations. Employing multiple aesthetic and disciplinary approaches we will analyze commercial films alongside independent films with particular attention to the market-driven and political mandates of these projects. We will focus on films by both Latina/o filmmakers and non-Latina/o filmmakers interrogating the multifarious points of entry of these artists.

(Fall) Topics in National/Transnational Cinemas: Topic: France Beyond the Mirror: The Image of France in Contemporary Francophone African Literature and Film

(French 341)

The relationship between colonizer and colonized is two-fold: on the one hand a visible, immediate (military, economic, and political) domination, and on the other, a more subtle, less visible (ideological) domination. These will be explored through texts (literature and films) representing both the metropolitan and the native, from the colonizer's point of view. This course will discuss first how, through its writers and filmmakers, France projected itself onto the imagination of colonized Africans and second, how, in response, Africans appropriated the pen and the camera to convey their perception of their French experiences with the metropolitan Other.

With the rest of the world, in 1995 filmmakers from the whole African continent met in Ouagadougou, to celebrate the Century of world cinema. This also gave African filmmakers an opportunity to reflect on their 30 years of film practice. Today, only a year after most former French colonies in Africa have celebrated the 50th anniversary of their independence, African cinema is also entering its fifties. This course will introduce students to a half a century of African cinema with a special attention to its history and its search for survival and self identity within world cinema.

Born in 1923 in Senegal, the writer/filmmaker Ousmane Sembène is one of the rare witnesses of the three key periods of contemporary African history: the colonial period; the period of struggle for political and economic independence; and the period of effort to eliminate neocolonialism through the rehabilitation of African cultures. This course is entirely devoted to the works of Ousmane Sembène and will explore the key moments of his life, his activism in European leftist organizations, his discovery of writing, and most of all the dominant features of his film work.

(Spring) Topics in National/Transnational Cinemas: Advanced Studies in Visual Culture: Memory (of) War - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 340)

The Spanish Civil War (1936-1939) and the repressive, right-wing military regime of Francisco Franco (1939-1975) have shaped contemporary thought and cultural production in Spain. Cinema in particular shows a persistent concern with war and memory. The films studied in this course raise a number of philosophical and political questions to this effect. How does the devastation of war register through the medium of film? How do censorship and propaganda condition memory, and how does the past return in a postdictatorship? What and why do people choose to remember or to forget? Films to be studied include both mainstream commercial features and experimental works, and range in genre.

(Fall) Topics in National/Transnational Cinemas: The French New Wave: Its Origins and Its Influence - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(French 331f (02))

The New Wave was a series of films made in the 1960s by a group of pioneers, who had seen almost every film ever made and particularly admired American and Russian cinema. This creative explosion, a reaction to "cinéma de Papa," won an aesthetic and political victory against an increasingly affluent, self-satisfied society, and brought about a revolution in the film industry.

(Spring) Topics in National/Transnational Cinemas: Queer Kinship in Asian North American Literature, and Film - *Not offered this year/term

(English 334s(01))

This course examines alternative kinship formations in Asian North American cultural production. It will focus on the gender and sexual management of racial bodies since the nineteenth century--from the U.S. Page Law of 1875 that restricted Chinese women on the basis of their presumed sexual immorality to various forms of "racial castration" that mediate Asian masculinities. We will consider how alternative kinship arrangements and queer cultural projects expose and/or upset the narrative assumptions embedded in heteronormative scripts of nationalism.

(Fall) Topics in Film Authorship: Henry James on Film - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive; English 345f-(01))

Preamble (for topics courses): Film Studies 380 offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific cinematic author. While most courses focus on a director or group of directors, courses may also focus on designers, technicians, performers, producers, or some combination of these personnel.

This seminar will examine the various screen adaptations of assorted novels by Henry James. We will read the novels against the films, exploring how James's texts translate--or do not translate--into film.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 8 credits in English beyond 101, or permission of instructor

Notes: 1 meeting (3 hours), 1 screening (2 hours)

(Spring) Topics in Film Authorship: Natural's Not in It: Pedro Almodóvar - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 340s-01)

Preamble (for topics courses): Film Studies 380 offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific cinematic author. While most courses focus on a director or group of directors, courses may also focus on designers, technicians, performers, producers, or some combination of these personnel.

This course studies the films of Pedro Almodóvar, European cinema's favorite bad boy turned acclaimed auteur. On the one hand, students learn to situate films within the context of contemporary Spanish history (the transition to democracy, the advent of globalization, etc.) in order to consider the local contours of postmodern aesthetics. On the other hand, the films provide a springboard to reflect on larger theoretical and ethical debates. For instance, what can a weeping transvestite teach us about desire? What happens when plastic surgery and organ transplants become metaphors? Under what circumstances, if any, can spectators find child prostitution cute?

Prerequisites: Film Studies 201, 202, or Spanish 221 or permission of instructor

Notes: Weekly evening screenings. Taught in English.

(Spring) Shakespeare and Film - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(English 312s)

Preamble (for topics courses): Film Studies 380 offers a critical, historical, and theoretical approach to a specific cinematic author. While most courses focus on a director or group of directors, courses may also focus on designers, technicians, performers, producers, or some combination of these personnel.

We will read plays by Shakespeare, watch films based on those plays, and study the plays, the films, and the plays-as-films. "Shakespeare" comes first, of course, both historically and as the source/inspiration for the films. Yet each film has its own existence, to be understood not just as an "adaptation," but also as the product of linked artistic, technical, and economic choices. Considering Shakespeare's plays as pre-texts (rather than prescriptions), we will look at early and recent films, both those that follow closely conventionalized conceptualizations of "Shakespeare," and those that tend to erase or emend their Shakespearean sources.

(Spring) Topics in Film Theory: Queer Theory and Recent Queer Film in Latin America - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement
(Writing-intensive; Spanish 320-08)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course offers a consideration of one or more of the methods through which the medium of film is understood aesthetically and/or culturally.

In the 1990s GLBT liberation entered the public sphere as a major political force. Simultaneously, American academia produced and exported a new academic discipline: queer studies. As a consequence, the North American liberational model displaced cultural and theoretical models of sexuality of other countries. We will consider some of the key U.S. texts that have consecrated queer studies as a discipline and juxtapose them with theories and cinematic texts from Argentina, Brazil, Chile, Cuba, and Mexico in order to recuperate cultural models under erasure in the wake of the U.S. model's identity-focused and consumer-driven triumphalism.

(Fall) Intermediate Level Courses in Culture and Literature: Introduction to the Literature and Culture of France and the French-Speaking World

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Writing-intensive)

This course introduces students to literature and culture from a variety of perspectives. It will increase confidence and skill in writing and speaking; integrate historical, political, and social contexts into the study of literary texts from France and the French-speaking world; and bring understanding of the special relevance of earlier periods to contemporary French and Francophone cultural and aesthetic issues. Students explore diversified works - literature, historical documents, film, art, and music - and do formal oral and written presentations.

Prerequisites: French 203, or placement score of 450+, or department placement

Instructors: N. Margolis

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): In order to explain the complexity of present-day France, this course will explore its most conflictual historical moments--feudalism, absolute monarchy, political and social revolutions. Students will learn the social and historical context of French art and architecture.

Histoire et Patrimoine: While exploring decisive moments of France's past, students will examine the development of art and architecture, from the Middle Ages to the 20th century, and familiarize themselves with the mentality of each period (Medieval tapestries, Romanesque and Gothic cathedrals, Renaissance castles, Classic and Rococo art and architecture, and 19th Century schools of painting). Through a combination of movies, readings, pictures, and interactive links on the syllabus, students will prepare for oral presentations and essays. (Fall) Period Courses: Topic: Le Moi féminin: fictions et vérités, 1100-1800

Preamble (for topics courses): The usual periodization of French literature and culture is by century. Some period courses focus on the characteristics of specific centuries. Others focus on artistic or intellectual movements: gothic, Renaissance, romantic. All period courses, whatever their conceptual framework, integrate texts and historical contexts.

A survey of the evolution of the woman's voice, whether lyrical, spiritual or expository, from Héloïse to Mme de Staël, in comparison with their (often more famous) male contemporaries, both mentors and rivals. Other authors to include: female troubadours and trouvères, Marie de France, Marguerite Porète, Marguerite d'Oingt, Christine de Pizan, Pernette du Guillet, Louise Labé, Marguerite de Navarre, Mme de Sévigné, and Françoise de Graffigny. All readings, discussion and papers in French, to consist in written responses and oral presentations (3 of each) with an individual choice of final paper or exam.

Prerequisites: two of the following courses: French 215, 219, 225, or 230, or permission of department chair and course instructor

Notes: Note: Class format will involve introductory lectures for background, while students should expect to participate actively in open discussion of each text, to submit a midterm paper and somewhat longer final research paper.

(Spring) Period Courses: Les Misérables

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): The usual periodization of French literature and culture is by century. Some period courses focus on the characteristics of specific centuries. Others focus on artistic or intellectual movements: gothic, Renaissance, romantic. All period courses, whatever their conceptual framework, integrate texts and historical contexts.

Hugo's epic masterpiece, written in exile, has everything: ceaseless adventures, crimes and punishments, love, hate, obsession, heroes, villains, the battle of Waterloo, and civil war. The sympathetic everyman, Jean Valjean, condemned to hard labor for stealing bread and relentlessly pursued by the pitiless policeman Javert, encounters unforgettable characters. We will examine how Hugo situates Valjean's escapes within a framework of social injustice and good triumphing over evil, balancing his political and romantic ideas. Reading, discussion, film screenings.

Prerequisites: two of the following courses: French 215, 219, 225, or 230, or permission of department chair and course instructor

(Spring) Period Courses: Moliere in Context

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): The usual periodization of French literature and culture is by century. Some period courses focus on the characteristics of specific centuries. Others focus on artistic or intellectual movements: gothic, Renaissance, romantic. All period courses, whatever their conceptual framework, integrate texts and historical contexts.

Viewing multimedia material of the digital age, we will approach vintage Moliere's plays, and watch him go after the vices of his time: tyranny of fathers, hypocrisy of church people, absurdity of social and literary snobs. We will focus on women and servants, prime victims of absolutism. Context will be provided through films such as Moliere, Le Roi Danse, Vatel, La Princesse de Cleves, The Rise to Power of Louis XIV. We will study Tartuffe, Don Juan, L'Ecole des Femmes, Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, Les Femmes Savantes. In this multimedia course students will achieve digital literacy, therefore the final project is a digital narration in iMovie. Technical support is provided in Audacity, Photoshop, iMovie, and iDVD, through scheduled workshops in LRC.

Prerequisites: two of the following courses: French 215, 219, 225, or 230, or permission of department chair and course instructor

(Fall) Seminar in Romance Languages and Cultures: Topic: Don Juan, Valmont, Casanova: Iconic Latin Lovers

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English; Spanish 360, Italian 361, French 321)

Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student's choice.

If all is fair in love and war, are there rules for the game of power and seduction? As we move through the golden ages of absolute power in Spain, France, and Italy, will we witness a change for women? Students will explore such questions as they read plays by Tirso de Molina, José Zorilla, Molière, Beaumarchais, Goldoni; Mozart's opera Don Giovanni, and film versions of Dangerous Liaisons and Casanova's Memoirs. Students will be encouraged to explore works by major Spanish, French, and Italian artists of the Baroque and Rococo periods, and view relevant contemporary films such as The King is Dancing, and Goya's Ghosts. The final term project is a digital narration in the target language of the student.

Prerequisites: for language majors: two courses in culture and literature at the 200-level

Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French must read texts and write papers in French to receive credit. This is a multimedia course where students achieve digital literacy. Technical support is provided in Audacity, Photoshop, iMovie, and iDVD, through scheduled workshops in LRC.

(Spring) Courses on Social and Political Issues and Critical Approaches: Topic: Le Roman d'initiation: Journeys to Maturity in the French Novel (post-1800)

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses examine a definable phenomenon--an idea, a movement, an event, a mentality, a cultural structure or system, an historical problem, a critical mode--relevant to the civilization of France or of French-speaking countries. Readings from a variety of disciplines shed light on the particular aspect of thought or culture being studied.

In this course, we will study novels (and a few films) that chronicle and analyze the coming-of-age process of a principal character. In each case, we will travel with the character as she/he moves from ignorance to knowledge, from naïveté to sophistication, from inexperience to experience, from adolescence to adulthood. Comparing and contrasting a number of works from several different historical periods, we will define both the constants and the variables of the subgenre of the roman d'initiation and examine its corollary themes: the family, the individual and society, gender, sexuality, travel, education, egotism, and introspection.

Prerequisites: two of the following courses: French 215, 219, 225, or 230, or permission of department chair and course instructor

Instructors: C. Rivers

(Fall) Courses in Francophone Studies: Topic: France Beyond the Mirror: The Image of France in Contemporary Francophone African Literature and Film

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Film Studies 370f(02))

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses study nonmetropolitan French-speaking cultures and literary works written in French outside Europe. Areas of focus are one or more of the following regions: Africa, the Caribbean, or Canada.

The relationship between colonizer and colonized is two-fold: on the one hand a visible, immediate (military, economic, and political) domination, and on the other, a more subtle, less visible (ideological) domination. These will be explored through texts (literature and films) representing both the metropolitan and the native, from the colonizer's point of view. This course will discuss first how, through its writers and filmmakers, France projected itself onto the imagination of colonized Africans and second, how, in response, Africans appropriated the pen and the camera to convey their perception of their French experiences with the metropolitan Other.

Prerequisites: two of the following courses: French 215, 219, 225, or 230, or permission of department chair and course instructor

Instructors: S. Gadjigo

(Fall) Courses in Advanced Language Study: Topic: Atelier de Traduction

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses investigate the French language, past or present, and refine students' linguistics skills by focusing on nuances of written and spoken expression. Areas of study may include stylistics, translation, phonology, morphology, syntax, rhetoric, and dramatic art.

This course is designed to give students practical, hands-on experience in the translation, from French to English, of a literary work. We will begin the semester with readings in translation theory before moving on to the selection (by students) of a literary text. Students will work collaboratively in teams on a collective translation; teams will meet on a weekly basis with the professor for a detailed review of the work in progress. At the end of the semester, each team will submit the definitive version of their translation as well as a paper reflecting on the particular linguistic challenges encountered and their resolution thereof.

Prerequisites: Two of French 215, 219, 225, 230, and one 300-level course in French department.

(Fall) Advanced level seminar: Topic: Imagining Freedom: From Walls to New Worlds

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): The seminar is intended to challenge students at the highest level. A regular rotation of topics ensures a variety of perspectives across genre and period, encompassing linguistic, literary, theoretical, and cultural issues of French and Francophone studies. Development of critical skills is stressed through classroom discussion and critique of writing projects, drawing on individual student interests and experiences as they relate to the topic of the course.

Real and metaphorical confinement has inspired novels, plays, poetry, films, testimonials, and works of art in France and the French-speaking world. How have writers, filmmakers, and artists represented the experience of material, psychological and metaphysical constraints? How have they imaginatively transcended and transformed closed spaces such as prisons, convents, asylums, Romantic malaise, colonial rule, the "univers concentrationnaire," illness, and the limits of the human condition? In what ways do the discourses of literature, art and cinema intersect with those of the laws and ideologies underlying institutions of social control? Works will span different centuries and cultures.

(Film Studies 370s)

Preamble (for topics courses): The seminar is intended to challenge students at the highest level. A regular rotation of topics ensures a variety of perspectives across genre and period, encompassing linguistic, literary, theoretical, and cultural issues of French and Francophone studies. Development of critical skills is stressed through classroom discussion and critique of writing projects, drawing on individual student interests and experiences as they relate to the topic of the course.

With the rest of the world, in 1995 filmmakers from the whole African continent met in Ouagadougou, to celebrate the Century of world cinema. This also gave African filmmakers an opportunity to reflect on their 30 years of film practice. Today, only a year after most former French colonies in Africa have celebrated the 50th anniversary of their independence, African cinema is also entering its fifties. This course will introduce students to a half a century of African cinema with a special attention to its history and its search for survival and self identity within world cinema.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course introduces students to global perspectives on gender and its construction. Specifically in this first-year seminar, we will consider gender and sexuality from international vantage points by drawing concretely on students' own experiences with gendered power dynamics. Through discussion and writing, we will explore diverse and at times clashing paradigms around the intersections among gender, race, class, embodiment, and sexuality. We will take an interdisciplinary approach to the distinctions between sex and gender, women's economic status, the making of masculinity, sexual violence, queer movements, racism, and the challenges of feminist activism across nations, and possibilities for change.

(Spring) Introduction to Gender Studies - *Not offered this year/term

This course examines the social and historical construction of gender from cross-cultural and interdisciplinary perspectives. The intersections among gender, race, class, and sexuality in various contexts, past and present, will be central to our inquiry. Topics will include the politics of appearance, women's economic status, sexual violence, racism, legacies of colonialism, the challenges of transnational feminist activism, and strategies for change. We will examine the development of feminist theory and its practices in various local and transnational contexts.

(Spring) Methods and Practices in Feminist Scholarship

How do scholars produce knowledge? What can we learn from differences and similarities in the research process of a novelist, a biologist, an historian, a sociologist, and a film critic? Who decides what counts as knowledge? We will examine a range of methods from the humanities, social sciences, and natural sciences, including visual analysis, archival exploration, interviewing, and ethnography, as we consider the specific advantages (and potential limitations) of diverse disciplinary approaches for feminist inquiry. We will take up numerous practical questions as well as larger methodological and ethical debates. This course provides a foundation for advanced work in the major.

(Fall) Women and Gender in the Study of Culture: The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly: Women in the Spanish Empire

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 230f (01))

During the Spanish Empire (sixteenth-eighteenth centuries), witches, prostitutes, transvestite warriors, and daring noblewomen and nuns violated the social order by failing to uphold the expected qualities of the ideal good woman and/or the expected sexual morality of the time. They were criticized, punished, and even burned at the stake. Students will study contradictory discourses of good and evil and beauty and ugliness in relation to women and their place in history. We will analyze historical and literary examples of so-called "bad" women in the Spanish Empire, such as Celestina, María de Padilla, Catalina de Erauso, and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of Culture: Gender and Animality

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Critical Social Thought 204)

Are animals persons? Subjects? Do they have gender? Important shifts in public opinion have taken place concerning the moral, legal, and affective status of animals, yet liberal Academia still marginalizes the "animal question." In this course, we will draw on feminism's engagement against speciesism to chart diverse forms of human/non-human companionship. The analytic categories of gender and species will be examined side by side for their usefulness in understanding a world in which we no longer approach the human as the great exception. We will consider theory, fiction, films, art work, and the internet in approaching post-human concepts of life, personhood, and subjectivity.

(Fall) Women and Gender in the Study of Culture: Double Takes: Women's Artistic Production in Contemporary Latin America

(Spanish 240f(01))

As women perform gender, so too do they perform culture. In this course we will explore the links between gender and modern Latin American culture through a study of nineteenth through twenty-first century feminist critical theories and self-representations. We will look at the construction of the female subject and her double, or "other," through travel writing, political writing, revolutionary testimonies, plays, and letters alongside the plastic arts. In addition to primary texts and media, we will read gender and queer theory to disentangle the complexity of women's representations as they intersect with race, class, ethnicity, and sexuality. Students will produce creative projects as well as essays as part of the course.

(Spring) Women and Gender in the Study of Culture: Androgyny and Gender Negotiation in Contemporary Chinese Women's Theater

(Taught in English; Asian Studies 215, Theatre Arts 234)

Yue Opera, an all-female art that flourished in Shanghai in 1923, resulted from China's social changes and the women's movement. Combining traditional with modern forms and Chinese with Western cultures, Yue Opera today attracts loyal and enthusiastic audiences despite pop arts crazes. We will focus on how audiences, particularly women, are fascinated by gender renegotiations as well as by the all-female cast. The class will read and watch classics of this theater, including Dream of the Red Chamber, Story of the Western Chamber, Peony Pavilion, and Butterfly Lovers. Students will also learn the basics of traditional Chinese opera.

(English 239)

Eighteenth-century England witnessed the birth of the novel, a genre that in its formative years was both lauded for its originality and condemned as intellectually and morally dangerous, especially for young women. We will trace the numerous prose genres that influenced early novelists, including conduct manuals, epistolary writing, conversion narratives, travelogues, romance, and the gothic. In doing so, we will concomitantly examine the novel's immense formal experimentation alongside debates about developing notions of gender and class as well as the feeling, thinking individual. Authors may include Richardson, Fielding, Sterne, Walpole, Burney, and others.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement
(Speaking- and writing-intensive; German 223)

As an extreme, but common experience, war creates, shapes, and contests normative constructions of masculinity, femininity, and gender relations in general. This seminar explores the concept of war, its causes, and its representation in memoirs, fiction, art, and photography within German-speaking realms with an emphasis on World War II and its aftermath. What impact does war have on gender relations within a matrix of other categories of identity, such as race, class, and sexuality? Materials include texts by Bachmann, Brecht, Celan, and other German writers and films such as Triumph of the Will and Das Boot.

(History 275)

Introduction to major themes in U.S. history through the lens of women's history. Located both near the centers of power in American society and at its margins, the history of women as a social group is one of conflict and diversity. While women do not make up a coherent group, all share the unique experience of being "women" in class, racial, and religiously specific ways. Themes include Native American and Hispanic women during European contact and settlement; the impact of the American Revolution; benevolent women and the "fallen" women they hoped to help; enslaved women and the plantation mistress; women in the multicultural west; women's involvement in the Civil War and Reconstruction.

(History 296s-02)

This course uses archival records, fiction, life histories, and outstanding recent scholarship to investigate African women's actions in a century that encompassed women's loss of agency and authority but the endurance of their responsibility for the production of food. We investigate the erosion of women's economic power and the loss of women's work of governing at conquest, in the early colonial period, and as a consequence of Africa's integration into the world economy as its least powerful player. We examine women's efforts to sustain productive activities in the face of opposition and the gendered tensions these efforts provoke. Optional fourth hour discussions.

(Religion 241)

This course explores women and Buddhism during different historical periods and in different cultures. Through a variety of sources, this course will illuminate Buddhist concepts of gender and sexuality, views of women's spiritual capacities, the diversity of women's images, roles, experiences, concerns, and contributions in Buddhist societies, and scholarly approaches to women in Buddhism. Special attention will be given to how gender is constructed in each cultural and religious context encountered, with particular emphasis on Buddhist women in Southeast Asia. We will look into the reasons why texts on religion have not always included the voices of women, and we will investigate ways to uncover them through research techniques and alternative hermeneutical strategies.

(Speaking-intensive; Psychology 208f)

Memory has a wide range of meanings and applications in many different contexts. What, for example, is the difference between artificial intelligence and human memory? How are national identities constructed around the commemoration of great events? What is the importance of memory in relation to concepts like justice and progress? How do rituals and performances work to determine gender and other identities? How can we understand the differences in episodic, implicit, long term, short term or working memory? For individuals and societies, what are the implications of the absence of memory? In this course, we examine psychological, social, political, and cultural approaches to memory.

This course will introduce students to concepts, figures and debates in feminist theory. What and who are the subjects of feminist theory? Who produces theory? In what forms does it appear? Following an interdisciplinary approach, we will explore feminist theory in relation to topics such as bodies, sexualities, citizenship, media, and science. By engaging feminist theory - past and present - alongside discussions of contemporary issues, we will also aim to achieve critical and experiential understandings of how societal norms, transformations and constraints inform feminist theorizing and feminist theoretical interventions.

(Spring) Feminist Theory: Feminist and Queer Theory

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

We will read a number of key feminist texts that theorize sexual difference, and challenge the oppression of women. We will then address queer theory, an off-shoot and expansion of feminist theory, and study how it is both embedded in, and redefines, the feminist paradigms. This redefinition occurs roughly at the same time (1980s/90s) when race emerges as one of feminism's prominent blind spots. The postcolonial critique of feminism is a fourth vector we will examine, as well as anti-racist and postcolonial intersections with queerness. We will also study trans-theory and its challenge to the queer paradigm.

We will be reading a number of key feminist texts that theorize the construction of sexual difference, and challenge the oppression of women. We will then address queer theory, an offshoot and expansion of feminist theory, and study how it is both embedded in, and redefines, the feminist paradigms. This redefinition occurs roughly at the same time (1980s/90s) when race emerges as one of feminism's prominent blind spots. We will study these shifts through the analysis of a few moving pictures, or, to put it differently: all you always wanted to know about feminism, but didn't think to ask filmmakers such as Almodóvar, Hitchcock, Jarman, Pasolini, Varda, and others.

(Physics 211s-01)

This course examines explanations for the underrepresentation of women in science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM) with an eye to identifying how to increase the participation of women in science. The course will address questions about gender differences in cognition and ability, the role of stereotyping, as well as the "leaky pipeline" issue, that is, the rate and timing of the departure of women from scientific fields. Course readings will explore the psychology of gender, as it relates to STEM. In addition, we will read research from physical scientists, reports from professional organizations such as the American Physical Society, and reports from congressional committees.

In the last 30 years, Latin America has seen the emergence of a large array of social movements that have shaped the political and economic processes in the region. From human rights to peasants' movements, from indigenous to unemployed movements, women have been increasingly involved in political activism. What has been the role of women in these movements? How have traditional women's roles been at the same time useful and an obstacle to their activism? How have women influenced the repertoires, frames, identities and strategies of these movements? We will answer these questions through the exploration of case studies in the region using academic readings, testimonies, and documentaries.

(Writing-intensive; Politics 271s)

This course will explore the relationship between feminism and capitalism in a contemporary context, particularly the way they reinforce and contradict one another. Examining this question through Marxist, liberal, post-structuralist, and post-colonial feminist theory, as well as the recent history of feminist and anti-capitalist movements, we will consider the economic and political underpinnings of feminist thinking and practice. Do certain feminisms carry implicit anti-capitalist commitments? To what extent are particular feminisms, especially liberal feminism, reliant upon capitalist structures and processes? What stakes might feminists have in preserving or uprooting capitalism?

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Disease, Destruction, and Death: The Figure of the Femme Fatale in French Narrative Fiction - *Not offered this year/term

(French 351s)

(Taught in French) An examination of vivid literary incarnations of the femme fatale, female characters eerily and inextricably linked to untimely, unseemly, or tragic death. Characters fall roughly into two categories: women who directly or indirectly bring about someone else's death; or women who serve as scapegoats, whose symbolically sacrificial death, at the conclusion of the novel, allows the other characters to continue their own lives. We will discuss these works as expressions of misogyny and fear of female sexuality while also attempting to reach broader conclusions about the implications of both individual texts and the femme fatale novel as a sub-genre.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: "Every Secret Thing": Contemporary Women's Autobiographical Narrative in French - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

This course will examine contemporary autobiographical narratives written by women, with a particular focus on authors whose works include multiple autobiographical texts of various genres: fictional, nonfictional, and semifictional. We will analyze the ways in which these authors present their life stories, especially its traumatic or secret episodes, and the ways in which their works discuss the process of that presentation and of memory itself. Themes that are common to these autobiographical texts include: relationships with family, education, sexuality, class, and love. In addition to literary texts, we will analyze in detail several autobiographical films made by women.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Women Writers: Early Feminisms - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement (Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 330f-01)

This course examines a variety of literary expressions of Early Modern Spanish women (Teresa de Avila, Catalina de Erauso, and María de Zayas among others). Attention will be paid to the formal means by which women writers emulated, appropriated, or subverted male-authored models. A significant part of the class will deal with the ways in which contemporary feminist theories can be used to complement, interpret, and flesh out ideas expressed by Early Modern women. Students will collaborate with the organization of an international conference on women to be held at MHC in September. Students will work on projects based on conference presentations and interview the participants.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Women Experimental Filmmakers - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement (Film Studies 340s(01))

This seminar examines experimental cinema made by women from the early 1950s, during the earliest years of the movement known as the American Avant-Garde, through the 1990s. While the class will read feminist film theory and see the work of such well-known filmmakers as Yvonne Rainer, Sally Potter, and Chantal Akerman, we will also examine the less familiar but highly influential films of women working in the home movie or diary mode, with particular emphasis on the work of Marie Menken.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Sociology of Gender - *Not offered this year/term

(Sociology 305F-01)

This course focuses on the social production of gender relationships across a range of institutional, interactional, intellectual, and cultural contexts. The syllabus is structured around selections from major social, political, economic, and cultural theories of gender in addition to several exemplary empirical studies. Weekly topics include kinship and socialization, the contemporary moral orders of masculinity and femininity, family organization, legal systems and nation-states, war and rape, and the gendered organization and deployment of expert authority in a range of social settings.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Feminist Poetics: The Poetess, Prophet, and Revolutionary - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive; English 377s-01)

This seminar will explore innovations in eighteenth- and nineteenth-century women's verse. By investigating experiments with narrative, genre, stanza form, meter, and figurative language, we will contemplate what political, social, and ideological problems women writers attempted to present and perhaps solve through linguistic creativity. Larger questions include how to define "feminist poetics" and what potential such a project might afford poets and thinkers today. To this end, we will read selections of poetry in conversation with contemporary feminist theory as well as representations of women's incantation, prophecy, and singing by male poets and novelists of the day.

(Fall) Advanced Seminar: Women and Gender in South Asia - *Not offered this year/term

(Speaking-intensive; History 301F-04)

This colloquium will explore the history of South Asia as seen from women's perspectives. We will read writings by women from the ancient period to the present. We will focus on the diversity of women's experiences in a range of social, cultural, and religious contexts. Themes include sexuality, religiosity, rights to education and employment, violence against women, modernity and citizenship -- in short, those issues central to women's movements in modern South Asia. In addition to the textual sources, the course will analyze Indian popular film and the representation of women in this modern visual genre.

(Taught in English; Asian Studies 350s-01)

Seminar on love, desire, and gender, major themes in Indian literature. We will read classic poems, plays, and narratives in translation from Sanskrit, Tamil, Hindi, and other languages, in relation to aesthetic theory, visual arts (miniature paintings), and performance genres (Indian dance, and the modern Bollywood cinema). Study of the conventions of courtly love, including aesthetic mood (rasa) and natural landscapes, and their transformation in Hindu bhakti and Sufi Muslim mystical texts, the Radha-Krishna myth, and film. Focus on representations of women and men, and on issues of power, voice, and agency.

(Anthropology 316f-01)

This course explores the gendered domains of food and agriculture as they unfold within household and community economies in the global south and in G-8 countries. We will examine the place of women in systems of food production, processing, marketing, and consumption. We will address locally regulated markets, cuisines, and peasant farming systems as they interface with international neo-liberal systems of market and trade. We will also pay close attention to emergent women's agricultural cooperatives and unions as they shape new transnational coalitions that offer sustainable (and flourishing) solutions to problems associated with post-industrial agriculture.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Gender and War - *Not offered this year/term

(English 372s-01)

This seminar will focus on depictions of war in the context of gender. When asked how we might prevent war, Virginia Woolf suggested that we must invent new language and methods rather than follow the path of the traditional "procession of educated men." What language emerges in works about the effects of war? Texts will include essays and films as well as selected works by writers such as Alcott, Whitman, Crane, Twain, Hemingway, Woolf, Silko, Morrison, and O'Brien.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Beyond Logocentrism - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 350s-01)

Logocentric thinking is characterized by the desire for a center or original guarantee of all meaning, and has dominated the Western world since Greek antiquity. It attempts to repress difference in favor of identity and presence. Feminists have extended the concept to talk about phallogocentrism as the logical underpinning of patriarchy, and seek to go beyond it. Thinking beyond logocentrism is also crucial for the new discipline of critical animal studies. In this course, we will study attempts at breaking with the (phal)logocentric model of subjectivity, many of which have emerged in the "mestizo/a" continent.

(Spring) Advanced Seminar: Bodily Desires: Sexuality in the U.S. from 1900 to the Present - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(History 301)

In this seminar, we will study the history of sexuality, desire, and bodies. The premise of this interdisciplinary seminar is that sexuality is both historically constructed (fluid and changing over time and culture) and embodied and lived (experienced for many as essential and unchanging). We will study experts who set out terms and frameworks for understanding modern sexuality; how in different ways and in different times communities of sexual minorities strategically used selected elements of expert discourse to forge their own narratives of self and desire. Students will examine sexual classifications--mainstream and "normal" or subcultural and "deviant"--as mutually constructed.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; German Studies 315, European Studies 315)

A gift of a voluminous scrapbook by an alumna (1909) studying German at MHC serves as the basis for this hands-on investigative course about global learning and daily life at MHC, in Germany, and Europe. Each student researches her individual area of interest to explore this crucial era when women in Europe pushed open all doors to higher education (1908); when women scientists, artists, and public leaders achieved prominence. Key question: how did women's education support women in defining and constructing their own paths to professional success, commitment to global public service, and desire for pleasure and personal happiness? Research outcome: bilingual media project.

Prerequisites: open to students who have completed at least 8 credits beyond German Studies 201; required online application, see <http://www.mtholyoke.edu/acad/gender/300level.html>

Notes: Taught in German. Students with interest in this topic and in global and European studies, but insufficient or no prior knowledge of German, should enroll in German Studies 330 (2 cr.) taught in English.

(Religion 323f)

Mary Daly, Elisabeth Schussler Fiorenza, Phyllis Trible, and Judith Plaskow, among others, have argued that traditional Jewish and Christian theological systems have overlooked the needs, concerns, histories, and contributions of women. Their challenges range from the historical modification of a presumably unbiased religious system to the outright rejection of a so-called patriarchal establishment. Whatever their approach, feminist theologies offer diverse and incisive tools for understanding how a theological system operates, how transitory cultural assumptions become embedded in ongoing doctrines, and how apparently minor adjustments can have significant ripple effects.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(History 301f-04)

Recent cultural histories of imperialism--European as well as U.S.--have illuminated the workings of race and gender at the heart of imperial encounters. This course will examine the United States' relationship to imperialism through the lens of such cultural histories. How has the encounter between Europe and America been remembered in the United States? How has the cultural construction of "America" and its "others" called into play racial and gender identities? How have the legacies of slavery been entwined with U.S. imperial ambitions at different times? And what can we learn from transnational approaches to "the intimacies of empire?"

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Spanish 330f(02))

During the Spanish Empire (sixteenth-eighteenth centuries), witches, prostitutes, transvestite warriors, and daring noblewomen and nuns violated the social order by failing to uphold the expected qualities of the ideal good woman and/or the expected sexual morality of the time. They were criticized, punished, and even burned at the stake. Students will study contradictory discourses of good and evil and beauty and ugliness in relation to women and their place in history. We will analyze historical and literary examples of so-called "bad" women in the Spanish Empire, such as Celestina, María de Padilla, Catalina de Erauso, and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

GEOG-206-01 - Geography - 2012-2013

(Spring) Political Geography

Systematically studies political phenomena and their geographic expression, at a variety of spatial scales - national, regional, and international. Major themes include nation-state formation, boundary, territory, and ethnic issues, regional blocs and spheres of influence, and conflicts over access to and use of resources.

(Fall) Global Movements: Migrations, Refugees and Diasporas

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

The voluntary and involuntary movement of people around the globe is the focus of this course on migrations, refugees, and diasporas. Questions of borders, nativism, transnationalism, the global economy, and legality thread through this course as we consider the many social, cultural, environmental, economic, and political factors shaping decisions to leave a home or homeland. Historical and contemporary case studies, compelling theoretical texts, and geographic perspectives on these topics collectively animate our discussions.

(Spring) The Political Economy of the Middle East and North Africa

In this course, the Middle East and North Africa are studied in terms of their physical, cultural, economic, and political geography. Emphasis is placed on the environmental conditions and ecological evolution, population and demographic characteristics, the resource base and major problems in the social, political, and economic transformation of the region.

(Fall) The African Environments

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

The course provides an integrated analysis of biogeography, environmental change, and hydrology within each of the biomes found in the African continent: forest, savanna, desert, coast, wetland, mountain, and Mediterranean environments. It also discusses the impact and significance of human activity on African environments by exploring debates about soil erosion, desertification, biodiversity and depletion, and conservation and development.

(Spring) Renewable Energy - *Not offered this year/term

Greater use of renewable energy is seen as a key component of any move to combat climate change, and is being aggressively promoted as such by the U.S. and other governments. Yet there is little economic analysis of renewable energy and a host of political hurdles. This course explores the economic and political dimensions of renewable energy and attempts to diagnose if decarbonization technology can be successful in terms of energy supply and security.

(Fall) Atmosphere and Weather - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

In this course we will learn weather forecasting skills. This will involve examining weather observations, satellite and radar images, surface and upper-air weather charts, and predictions made by computer models. We will have an opportunity to learn atmospheric dynamics and gain an understanding of the Earth's radiation budget. Topics will include severe storms, hurricanes, and winter weather.

Prerequisites: high school earth science or any 100-level natural science course

Instructors: The department

Expected enrollment: 15

GEOG-225-01 - Geography - 2012-2013

(Spring) People and Forests - *Not offered this year/term

Unplanned deforestation, which is occurring at unsustainable rates in many parts of the world, can cause significant hardships for rural communities by destroying critical stocks of fuel, fodder, food, and building materials. It can also have profound regional and global consequences by contributing to biodiversity loss, erosion, floods, lowered water tables, and climate change. This course explores the complex interactions between local communities and their forests. Case studies are used to illustrate policy options and provide a better understanding of the linkages between residents, local institutions, and forest health.

(Spring) Regional Planning - Special Topics - *Not offered this year/term

This course examines the post 2nd World War transition of US urban communities to suburban communities. The first part of the semester will survey urban design and planning efforts from the early 1900s through the 1940s and the abrupt change in focus during the post war suburban sprawl period. The second half of the semester will focus upon future urban and suburban development paradigms in the absence of cheap energy and a weakening economy.

(Fall) Seminars - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): These seminars present selected topics in geography that reflect contemporary problems, current geographical ideas, philosophical and methodological trends in geography, and/or the history and development of geographical thought.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 4 credits in department and 4 credits in related social sciences at 200 level

Instructors: The department

(Spring) Seminars: Geographies of Racial Mixing and Multiraciality

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): These seminars present selected topics in geography that reflect contemporary problems, current geographical ideas, philosophical and methodological trends in geography, and/or the history and development of geographical thought.

The growing racial diversity of the United States is evident at all spatial scales, from the individual body, to the household, neighborhood, city, and state. This course examines this topic by first exploring the instability and power of racial categories and the spatiality of racial identities and privilege. We then focus our attention on historical and contemporary patterns of racial mixing, mixed-race partnerships, and multiraciality and think through the challenges that race poses.

Prerequisites: jr, sr and 4 credits from the department and four 200-level related social science credits

Instructors: S. Houston

Expected enrollment: 18

GEOG-313-01 - Geography - 2012-2013

(Fall) Third World Development

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Offers an interdisciplinary perspective on social, economic, and political features of contemporary development in Africa, Asia, and Latin America, regions referred to as the Third World or the South, and provides an introduction to theoretical origins and definitions of economic growth, development, and underdevelopment. It then addresses more specific aspects of development such as trends in population growth, migration, and urbanization; agrarian change; livelihood strategies and aspects of social welfare such as health, education, and shelter; poverty and the environment; and external economic relationships. The latter part of the course draws extensively on selected case studies.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, 4 credits in Geography and 4 credits in related social sciences at 200-level

Instructors: G. Kebede

Expected enrollment: 20

GEOG-319-01 - Geography - 2012-2013

(Spring) Africa: Problems and Prospects

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking-intensive)

This course intends to offer an interdisciplinary perspective on selected contemporary development problems in Africa south of the Sahara. Central to the course will be an examination of the social, economic, and political consequences of colonialism, the physical resource base and ecological crisis, agrarian systems and rural development, gender relations and development, urbanization and industrialization, and the problems and prospects of regional cooperation and integration.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, soph with permission of instructor; 4 credits in department and 4 credits at the 200 level in geography or related social science.

Instructors: G. Kebede

Expected enrollment: 20

GEOG-320-01 - Geography - 2012-2013

(Spring) Research with Geospatial Technologies

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

Geographic Information Systems (GIS) and remote sensing are essential tools for geographic analysis in both the biophysical and social sciences. This course uses a semester-long project that includes field and laboratory instruction to allow students to develop hands-on skills with spatial data and analysis software. Students will be able to present potential employers with a portfolio containing examples of their ability to develop and execute a GIS/remote sensing application project.

Geology

GEOL-100-01 - Geology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Physical Geology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

From earthquakes to landscapes, deserts to glaciers, landslides to limestone, this course introduces the surficial and internal processes of the earth. Learn to interpret the geology of your surroundings when traveling to new places and understand how geologic setting influences how people live. Lectures focus on exploring and explaining geological features and processes using concept sketches. Labs focus on mineral and rock identification, map reading, and local field trips.

Notes: Preference given to first- and second-year students during the first week of registration. Juniors and Seniors should check ISIS after that for availability.

GEOL-101-01 - Geology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Environmental Geology with Lab

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

The only planet known to sustain life, Earth provides all the resources that sustain us, yet it can be an unpredictable and sometimes dangerous home. Floods, earthquakes, volcanic eruptions, and other natural processes challenge our ingenuity, while we also contend with self-induced problems such as pollution, desertification, and even global climate change. This course examines earth processes, how these affect our lives, and how we can best live with and sustain our environment. The labs covers selected geologic topics including methods for recognizing and interpreting environmental hazards, and developing strategies to address environmental problems.

Prerequisites: 4 credits; 2 meetings (75 minutes), 1 lab (3hours), field trips.

Notes: Preference given to first- and second-year students with 25 spaces held for first-year students. Junior and seniors should register at the academic fair on a first-come, first-served basis. The lecture for this course meets at the same time as the lecture for GEOL 107.

(Fall) History of Life

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

Life forms have inhabited the surface of our planet for most of its history. Earth, as a result, has a unique geology that is unlike that of any other planet. In this course we will examine the interrelations between life processes and Earth's crust and atmosphere and how they work together to create the geology of the planet. Using both the rock and fossil record, we will study the origin and evolution of life, the history of continents and oceans, and the diversification of complex life forms. Laboratory and field trips will emphasize identification and analysis of sediments, rocks, and fossils.

(Spring) Oceanography

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

Because more than seventy percent of our planet is covered by oceans, the study of marine systems is crucial to our understanding of the Earth. In this course, we will examine chemical, physical, geological, and biological processes in the oceans at a variety of scales in time and space. We will explore how the Earth's oceans formed, how they provided the foundations for life, and how they continue to affect weather and climate, stabilize global chemical cycles, interact with the terrestrial environment, and give us access to resources.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Art in Paleontology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

First-year seminar

Paleontological art brings ancient organisms back to life. In this course we will consider the role that art itself plays as a mode of scientific discovery. We will examine how artists can uncover key information about prehistoric life well in advance of its recognition by the scientific community. Our primary text will be Charles R. Knight: The Artist Who Saw Through Time. In a collaborative class project, we will identify the best and most representative works for a proposed exhibition at the Mount Holyoke College Museum of Art. For individual final class projects, students may choose between a research paper and presentation, and their own paleontological artwork in any visual medium.

(Spring) First-Year Seminar: Emergence of Animals

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

The origin of animals was one of the most important events in the history of earth. In this course we will review the history of the planet, learn basic geology, and then examine the problem of the origin of animals by studying Mount Holyoke's unequalled collection of Precambrian and Cambrian fossils. The emergence of animals has been called the Cambrian Explosion. We will examine what this means for our understanding of evolutionary theory.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Introduction to Climate Change

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

First-year seminar

Climate change is one of the most significant and hotly debated issues of our time. This course examines the causes of natural climate change over geologic time scales and recent (and projected) changes in the climate system. By studying archives of past climate records, we know that the Earth's climate has changed wildly in the past - how can we be so sure that current warming is caused by human activity? What can we expect in the future and what should we do now to avoid potentially devastating consequences?

(Fall) Rocks and Minerals

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

In this course you will learn to recognize the common rock-forming minerals and principal rock types, and to understand their origins, properties, associations, and geological significance. Observational skills and hand sample identification will be emphasized in lab and on field trips. Students must have a one-year high school earth science class or any 100- or 200-level geology course or Geography 107.

(Fall) Surface Processes

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

The surface of the Earth is a history book of past environmental change. Every hill and valley, every erosional feature and every deposit is the result of processes acting at the Earth's surface. In this course we study these processes (e.g., glaciers, rivers, slopes, coastlines, windblown sand, frozen ground, cave formation, soil development) to better understand how they work and to understand the resulting landforms and deposits. With this understanding we can then observe different landforms and deposits and infer past processes (environments of deposition). Fieldwork and trips allow students to explore firsthand the processes that have created and modified the Earth's surface.

(Fall) Plate Tectonics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Plate tectonic theory explains the origins of volcanoes and earthquakes, continental drift, and the locations of mountain belts and oceans. This course focuses on the geometry of plate tectonics. Topics include mid-ocean ridge systems, transform faults, subduction zones, relative plate motion, earthquake analysis, triple point junctions, and stereographic projection. Work includes individual research projects on active plate boundaries.

Notes: Comfort with geometry and trigonometry required.

(Spring) Paleontology-Stratigraphy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course provides an intensive study of fossils, fossil preservation, relationships between major groups of organisms, depositional environments, sediments, sedimentary rocks, and the processes of sedimentation. We will employ the principles of stratigraphic analysis and correlation to interpret ancient environments and paleoclimate, reconstruct paleogeography, and probe the characteristics of sedimentary basins. Laboratory exercises and field trips will introduce a variety of analytical techniques used to study sedimentary rocks.

(Fall) Structural Geology and Orogenesis - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course covers the basic techniques of field geology and structural analysis: field techniques, stress, strain, faulting, folding, rock strength, deformation mechanisms, and multidisciplinary approaches to mountain building (orogenesis). Most labs are field trips that involve data collection. Weekly writing assignments focus on presenting original research and distinguishing between observations and interpretations. During the final weeks of the semester, oral presentations and a final paper emphasize fluency in the published literature of structural geology.

(Fall) History of the Earth

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course explores the evolution and interaction of life, rocks, oceans, and air during the past 4 billion years of earth history. Some topics covered are: ice ages and greenhouse atmospheres, continental drift, extinctions and radiations of flora and fauna, the early evolution of earth, absolute and relative dating of rocks, and the geologic time scale. Labs teach geologic map interpretation and computer modeling of earth systems. Writing and speaking assignments focus on critical analysis of recently published research, proposal writing and the design and testing of earth science hypotheses.

(Fall) Seminars: Water Resources Evaluation - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Preamble (for topics courses): Seminars offer directed study and discussion of one or more selected topics in geology. Topics vary from year to year.

The hill town of Shutesbury, Massachusetts, is concerned about its water resources. Simply put, the town needs to know if there are limitations regarding water supply or water quality that should influence decisions of development and zoning. This lab and field based course will collect samples and gather (from existing town records) data in order to provide a better understanding of the hydrologic conditions in the town. Weekly meetings will involve field sampling and laboratory analysis of water samples and the mapping of soil and bedrock hydrologic properties. Each student will pursue her own research project and present their results in a final report.

(Spring) Seminar: Uranium

Credits/PE Units: 2; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Preamble (for topics courses): Seminars offer directed study and discussion of one or more selected topics in geology. Topics vary from year to year. Consult the department for information about future seminars.

Uranium (U) series dating has revolutionized our understanding of geologic time. U and its radiogenic daughters, like lead (Pb) and Thorium (Th), have provided us with dates for events as disparate as the formation of our solar system and the rise and fall of sea level in response to geologically recent climate and tectonic events. This seminar will survey the U-Pb, Th-Pb, and Pb-Pb methods; the common lead method; U/Th series disequilibria; and fission track dating. We may also cover Plutonium production and the mining and enrichment of Uranium for nuclear power and weapons. This seminar will meet most Friday afternoons.

(Fall) Representations of the Holocaust

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English)

We explore public and personal narratives surrounding the Holocaust. What role do written and visual representations play in our understanding of the topic? Are there discrepancies between personal stories and public histories and what are they? With an emphasis on concentration camps, we investigate who has the authority to decide what happens on the grounds of the camps today. In addition, we will investigate how memorial sites, museums, and films communicate the Holocaust. A brief introduction into German history (1933 to 1945) looking at perpetrators, victims, and resistance groups will complement the discussion. We will take part in organizing an exhibition at Mount Holyoke.

(Fall) Topics in German Studies: German Culture from 1800 to 2000 Visions and Discoveries That Transformed the Present: Voices of Makers and Filmmakers

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; European Studies 223)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course examines the cultural, political and social developments from 1800 to the present by investigating a significant topic in the German tradition and its interconnections to larger transnational context. The selection of materials is exemplary rather than comprehensive and is based on thematic, historical, generic and other units.

The "long nineteenth century," with the political explosion of the French Revolution and scientific explosion of the steam engine, burst into modernity, defining itself and the "short twentieth century" in manifold areas: science, economics, politics, art, literature, education. Controversial values are attributed to concepts like secularization, nation-building, industrialization, and democratization. We will analyze representations in film and text of such discoveries and visions, e.g., in bacteriology, environmentalism, political and social upheaval, the concept of a democratic nation state, Marx's theories; Bismarck's German unification, the social-security system; and women's movements.

Prerequisites: Previous study of German

Notes: Students enrolled in 223 are expected to enroll in the complementary two-credit tutorial (German Studies 224). The 224 tutorial will stress film visions by women directors, along with working on revising written work from 223. 323 students are not expected to enroll in 224. 223 and 323 students share one class meeting; for the second weekly session, each group meets separately. (Spring) Topics in German Studies: The Art and Science of Revolution in German Cultures

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; European Studies 223s)

Preamble (for topics courses): This course examines the cultural, political and social developments from 1800 to the present by investigating a significant topic in the German tradition and its interconnections to larger transnational context. The selection of materials is exemplary rather than comprehensive and is based on thematic, historical, generic and other units.

Revolutions are deeply embedded in cultural, economic, political, and environmental structures. Some are violent, some are peaceful; some evolve out of historical processes over long periods of time; and others emerge spontaneously without warning. Still others are material in nature, such as the industrial revolution or the end of the Berlin wall. The seminar explores the causes, forms, and impact of major revolutions in German cultures from the invention of the printing press to the most recent "Wende" that led to unification. Other revolutions include the French Revolution, the German Revolution of 1848, the founding of the Weimar Republic, and the student movement in 1968.

(Fall) German Literature and Culture in European Context: Introduction to Nineteenth-Century Critical Social Thought

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Taught in English; Critical Social Thought 250)

Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the reader's responses to them.

An introduction to some of the great critical voices of the nineteenth century with emphasis on their relevance for contemporary issues. We will explore the ideas of such mutinous thinkers as Karl Marx Friedrich Nietzsche, Sigmund Freud, Fyodor Dostoyevsky, W.E.B. Du Bois and Franz Kafka focusing on the style as well as the substance of their works and the circumstances that provoked them to write and/or that their writings helped provoke. The course will highlight the tension between appearance and reality, the dialectic of domination and subordination, and the place of reason and irrationality in social life. Case studies of contemporary issues with attention to the impact of 19th century thinkers on critical theory in the 20th and 21st centuries also round out the course.

Prerequisites: so, jr, sr, or permission of instructor

Notes: Students with one or more years of college-level German may opt for German 232, a tutorial in close reading and translation of the German texts related to the material in 231. Students with no previous study of German are encouraged to take German 101 or 103 to complement this course.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Taught in English; Film Studies 220f-03)

Preamble (for topics courses): An introduction to critical reading, writing, and arguing skills, emphasizing the practice of oral and written strategies for discussing and analyzing printed and film texts and the reader's responses to them.

Focus on the discussion and analysis of films by German women directors from Lotte Reiniger, pioneer of animation films, and Leni Riefenstahl, controversial director and mythmaker of the Third Reich, to such trailblazing women directors of the New German Cinema as Margarethe von Trotta, Jutta Brückner, and Helma Sanders-Brahms. Moreover, we will attempt to determine whether more recent women directors like Doris Dörrie or Caroline Link, including those of migration background like Yasemin Samdereli, developed special (trans)gendered and transnational gazes that led them to focus so frequently on variations of (tragi)comedy in film.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Europe, and Germany, are poised at a crossroads to decide Europe's future. One group proclaims the "death of multiculturalism" and the staunch belief in a "Christian heritage" of the European Enlightenment, another calls for a vocal and violent rejection of all that is deemed "Western" and "immoral". The paths they would choose, paradoxically, might turn out the same road to intolerance and destruction of the perceived "other." This course emphasizes, in word and film, the voices of immigrant and Islamic-heritage citizens; it focuses on such key issues as human rights vs. freedom of religion; constructions of cultural and national identities; and the (dis)integrative role of language.

Prerequisites: Previous study of German

Notes: majors/minors in the department should simultaneously enroll in both German Studies 232 (taken for 300-level credit) and GRMST-315 to receive major/minor credit, and read, write about, and discuss selected materials from GRMST-315 in German.

(Spring) Topics in German and European Studies in a Global Context: Faust vs. Mephisto: The Struggle for the "Western Soul" - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Taught in English; European Studies 316)

Preamble (for topics courses): This seminar is designed to explore theoretically and practically the nature of our field of inquiry. We explore such questions as: What does German studies mean? What is interdisciplinary work? What role does literature play in culture studies? What is the relationship between language and the construction of culture? What meanings have been attributed to the terms of "culture" and "civilization?" Texts from a variety of disciplines. Students write term papers on topics related to their major field(s) of interest.

Faust is often called "the epitome of Western 'man'"; but the Faustian is tied to the struggle with the Mephistophelian, thereby signifying the dualism characteristic of the Western worldview. We will investigate the Faust topos from early sixteenth-century historical records to the present, including Spies's Faustbuch, Marlowe's The Tragical History of the Life and Death of Dr. Faustus, Goethe's Faust and Peter Stein's contemporary stage rendition, Lasker Schüler's female Faust, renditions by Th. Mann and Bulgakov, Gounod's opera, and the popular rock opera. In addition, we will probe into the social and cultural issues surrounding Klaus Mann's Mephisto and its censorship scandal in 1968.

Notes: Note: language requirement in German met only if seminar is taken in conjunction with 2-credit tutorial (German Studies 332) taught in German. For credit toward minimum major or minor in German Studies, students must also complete the 2-credit German Studies 332 tutorial, in German, this semester.

(Fall) Foundation: How Wars End

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

First-year seminar

What social processes and institutions are necessary to bring an end to war? Do the efforts of citizens make a difference? What is the role of beliefs regarding identity? What about access to resources? What is the role of visible forms of restorative or retributive justice? This first year seminar focuses primarily on small, regional conflicts in Africa to explore the social processes and institutions which facilitate the resolution of conflict. We will begin in the late 19th century, but concentrate on more recent events. Course assignments are designed to develop skills in academic writing, historical research, and collaborative learning.

(Spring) Foundation: Gossips, Liars, Preachers, Truth-Tellers: Information Networks and (Mis)Communication in Early America

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

First-year seminar

Social networks, multimedia, the rapid transmission of information across cultural boundaries and geographic distances: the twenty-first century can seem like a brave new world for communication. Yet the peoples of the Americas have long been involved in creative ways of connecting with each other. This course surveys the history of communication in early America, from wampum beads to oral traditions, speeches to incendiary political pamphlets, comets to newspapers, inscribed rocks to Neoclassical poetry.

(Fall) Foundation: The Country and the City

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

First-year seminar

This first year seminar explores the history of the country and the city in modern Britain and asks how the conceptualization of these places has shaped our understanding of what it means to be modern. We will address topics such as industrial transformation, the city and country in fiction, rural political radicalism, preservation and recreation in the countryside, organic and environmental movements, and the contemporary politics of rural life. Through intensive reading, writing and discussion of these topics we will also practice the basic tools and techniques of liberal arts learning, from using a research library to formulating and crafting clear and coherent academic writing.

(Fall) Modern East Asia, 1600-2000

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

A comparative history of China, Japan, and Korea from the early seventeenth century to the present, with strong focus on regional interaction. After an introduction to early modern histories and cultures, we will examine the struggles of these countries to preserve or regain their independence and establish their national identities in a rapidly changing, often violent modern world order. While each of these countries has its own distinctive identity, their overlapping histories (and dilemmas) give the region a coherent shape. We will also look at how individuals respond to and are shaped by larger historical movements.

(Spring) Violence and Social Change in Modern Africa

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Community-based learning course)

(Writing-enriched course) This course examines processes of change that have shaped modern Africa. It seeks to provide both the information and the conceptual tools necessary for an informed interpretation of African affairs presented (and not presented) by popular media. Using fiction, historical narratives, and a wide range of interdisciplinary sources, the class examines nineteenth-century interactions of Africans and Europeans and the nature of colonial conquest, economic and social change during the colonial period, and the emergence of postcolonial African societies. A collaboration with recently arrived African immigrants is required of all participants.

(Taught in English; Russian and Eurasian Studies 205f(01))

We will study defining periods in Russian and world history with an emphasis on the powerful Russian monarchs who shaped them: in particular, Peter the Great, Catherine the Great, Alexander II, and Nicholas II. Russia's tsarist system raises important questions about the nature of the monarchy. The Russian case shows how monarchies can change and develop, and why, ultimately, many of them failed. Why did the Romanovs fail when their relatives, the House of Windsor, did not? Could Russia have survived as a constitutional monarchy? What is the role of a royal dynasty in defining nationhood?

(Spring) African Cities: Development Dreams and Nightmares in the Twentieth Century - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

African cities demonstrate the failure of models of development with the aim and ideal of industrialization. This course examines the empty promises of modernity through the lens of African urban history using fiction, film, and city archives. Beginning with Timbuctu and Cairo, the course explores the emergence and decline of trade entrepôts, the rise of colonial cities, and the dilemmas of postcolonial economies and politics. Dar es Salaam,

Nairobi, Kampala, Kinshasa, Harare, Johannesburg, Lagos, Accra, and Dakar are among the cities studied. Designed for those seeking only an introduction to development as well as those with further ambitions, it assumes no previous knowledge of Africa.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Community-based learning course)

Why are some nations so much richer and more powerful than others? This course demonstrates that global inequality is not natural; it has a history. Exploring patterns of exchange that developed among regions of the world over the past 600 years, we will ask about the role of power in the establishment of practices of production and exchange. We will explore how cross-regional productive systems benefited some participants at the expense of others. Having traced the consequences of unequal exchange over several centuries, we will ask how global trade and production would have to change for all participants to benefit equally. The course includes a community-based learning component.

(Spring) Science, Revolution, and Modernity

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Critical Social Thought 248)

Introduces critical analysis of science and technology by tracing the historiography of the Scientific Revolution. The significance of this extended intellectual episode has been assessed in radically different ways throughout the intervening centuries. As such, it provides a fertile ground on which to pose and answer important questions about science and its role in society. What does it mean to regard science as 'revolutionary'? How are scientific developments shaped by, and how do they shape, the social, economic, and political worlds in which they are embedded? How is our contemporary understanding of science and technology influenced by the stories we tell about the past?

(English 250)

This course probes the characteristics of imperial rule, as well as the differences between one empire and another. The course asks: What are empires, and what animates them - economic exploitation, power politics, and/or cultural commitments? How do empires impose and maintain their authority, and what is their impact on centers and provinces, and on elites and the common people? How do empires deal with the heterogeneous peoples, religions, races, and cultures they conquer and incorporate into their fold? Who is driven to resist imperial power, how do they resist, and what other forces lead empires to dissolve? Finally, what is the relation between empire and the modern nation state?

(Gender Studies 206f(01))

Introduction to major themes in U.S. history through the lens of women's history. Located both near the centers of power in American society and at its margins, the history of women as a social group is one of conflict and diversity. While women do not make up a coherent group, all share the unique experience of being "women" in class, racial, and religiously specific ways. Themes include Native American and Hispanic women during European contact and settlement; the impact of the American Revolution; benevolent women and the "fallen" women they hoped to help; enslaved women and the plantation mistress; women in the multicultural west; women's involvement in the Civil War and Reconstruction.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses are designed for students with a background in American history who wish to focus attention on developments since the late nineteenth century.

The United States emerged from the Second World War as the most powerful nation on earth. This course explores American political, cultural, and social life in the postwar era, with an eye toward helping students gain a firmer understanding of contemporary issues and conflicts in our nation and around the world. Topics include birth of the national security state, the Cold War at home and abroad, popular culture and consumer society, the civil rights struggle, the political and cultural rebellions of the 1960s, the resurgence of conservatism, and America's changing relationship to the world in the post Cold War era. Students will have the opportunity to do a research paper on the topic of their choice.

(Spring) Topics in the Recent History of the United States: Cultural and Environmental History of Mount Holyoke College Campus

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Speaking-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): These courses are designed for students with a background in American history who wish to focus attention on developments since the late nineteenth century.

This lecture and discussion course studies the cultural and environmental history of the College from its origins in the farmlands of South Hadley to recent efforts to re-create former traditions and to preserve its historic landscape. Themes center on changing ideas about women, nature and natural scenery, learning and living; on the interactions of the College community and its physical environment; in sum, on ideas and practices embedded in the campus landscape, recorded in the College Archives, and interpreted by historians and writers in the broad context of American history.

(Fall) History, Ecology, and Landscape

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course explores ecological thinking and changes in landscape through human intervention and natural processes, primarily from the eighteenth century to the present. Our survey of thinking will include Europeans such as the founder of modern ecology, Ernest Haeckel, and Americans Henry David Thoreau, John Muir, and Frederick Law Olmsted. Our study of historical landscapes will center on land use practices and water resources and river basins--the Merrimack, the Charles, and the Connecticut; on the interplay of agriculture, forests, and water power in industrialization; and on the Boston Fens designed by Olmsted and our own backyard, the Connecticut River Valley.

(Spring) Education and Capacity in African History

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement
(Community-based learning course)

How have Africans organized education? Who had access, and what did they learn? We explore the nineteenth and twentieth century transformation of African systems of education, including the significant involvement of African American educational reformers. A focus of the course will be developing the capacity to carry out historical research with written and oral sources. Our topics will include approaches to archival research, ethical research design, and strategies for participant-observation and interviewing. Students must commit to a semester-long collaboration with Springfield's Renaissance School.

(Spring) Women in History: African Women: Food and Power - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement
(Gender Studies 206)

This course uses archival records, fiction, life histories and outstanding recent scholarship to investigate African women's actions in a century that encompassed women's loss of agency and authority but the endurance of their responsibility for the production of food. We investigate the erosion of women's economic power and the loss of women's work of governing at conquest, in the early colonial period, and as a consequence of Africa's integration into the world economy as its least powerful player. We examine women's efforts to sustain productive activities in the face of opposition and the gendered tensions these efforts provoke. Optional 4th hour discussions.

(Fall) Colloquium: Homelands and New Worlds: Landscapes of Encounter in the Native Northeast and Colonial New England

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course examines Native and colonial understandings of "place" in the region today called New England. Beginning with indigenous homelands, it investigates Algonquian Indian ancestral and mythic landscapes that rooted Native communities in particular ecosystems. It moves through the colonization period, tracking how European arrivals transferred Old World ideas, agendas, and organisms into new environments. It examines colonists' strategies for exploiting natural resources of the rivers, forests, and coasts, and for developing built environments that made the New World feel like home.

(Spring) Colloquium: Women and Gender in Modern South Asia

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Gender Studies 333-N)

This colloquium will explore the history of South Asia as seen from women's perspectives. We will read writings by women from the ancient period to the present. We will focus on the diversity of women's experiences in a range of social, cultural, and religious contexts. Themes include sexuality, religiosity, rights to education and employment, violence against women, modernity and citizenship--in short, those issues central to women's movements in modern South Asia. In addition to the textual sources, the course will analyze Indian popular film and the representation of women in this modern visual genre.

(Fall) Colloquium: Martyrdom as Social Protest: Resistance and Honor in Antiquity and the Middle Ages

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

We find martyrs in times of crisis, under tyranny and persecution. Yet not all victims of tyranny and persecution become martyrs, nor are all martyrs victims of tyranny. What social and political conditions have in the past fostered the choice of martyrdom? What cultural values drive this form of self-immolation? What's worth dying for? In antiquity, the word "martyr" meant an active "witness"; today it can mean a "passive victim." Our approach uses cross-cultural historical comparisons to help understand how martyrdom shaped history and culture from the ancient world of the Mediterranean and of Europe to the early modern period.

(Fall) Colloquium: Race, Gender, and Empire: Cultural Histories of the United States and the World

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Gender Studies 333G)

Recent cultural histories of imperialism--European as well as U.S.--have illuminated the workings of race and gender at the heart of imperial encounters. This course will examine the United States' relationship to imperialism through the lens of such cultural histories. How has the encounter between Europe and America been remembered in the United States? How has the cultural construction of "America" and its "others" called into play racial and gender identities? How have the legacies of slavery been entwined with U.S. imperial ambitions at different times? And what can we learn from transnational approaches to "the intimacies of empire?"

(Spring) Colloquium: History of Money and Finance

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This seminar explores the history of money and finance in modern Britain, from the seventeenth century to the mid-twentieth. It addresses this history not from the perspective of classical economics or political economy, but rather from that of cultural history. Using a variety of primary and secondary source readings, students will learn how such things as coins, bills of exchange and the Bank of England relate to questions of virtue, respectability, and the modern self, and they will consider how Britons crafted new identities and negotiated changing social relations using the objects and practices of monetary and financial exchange.

(Spring) Colloquium: World War I and the Making of the Twentieth Century - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

World War I (1914-1918) was arguably the transformative event of the twentieth century. It destroyed four empires, enabled the Russian Revolution, reconstructed the political geography of Central Europe, strengthened independence movements in European possessions overseas, and facilitated the rise of fascism and a second world war (1939-1945). This course explores this history by examining the war's origins, nature, and manifold consequences from 1880s to 1939 in Europe and in global perspective. Materials for historical study and discussion include memoirs by women and men, civilians, nurses, and soldiers; newspapers and magazines, images, films, poetry.

(Spring) Late Antiquity: The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): Research Seminar: A 300-level class requiring students to engage in primary and secondary source research in the history of particular times and places, resulting in a substantial piece of historical writing.

In his masterpiece, The Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, Edward Gibbon catalogued the end of the classical era, "during which the condition of the human race was most happy and prosperous." We shall reexamine the various factors and forces Gibbon blamed for decline in light of modern research: barbarian invasions, the rise of Christianity, economic decay, and social dislocation, as well as investigating new discoveries and modern interpretations of the "transformations of Late Antiquity."

Preamble (for topics courses): Research Seminar: A 300-level class requiring students to engage in primary and secondary source research in the history of particular times and places, resulting in a substantial piece of historical writing.

This seminar uses primary and secondary sources to explore relationships among capital, labor, and the state in three distinct periods: the non-union era (c.1870s-1920s) the union era (c.1930s-1970s) and the era of global capital and non-union labor (c.1980s-present). We will analyze defining documents and leading historiographical interpretations, devoting special attention to labor reformers--on both sides of the union divide--across time and space. Students will be required to participate in class discussion and produce a research paper on some aspect of American conservatism.

This course provides an introduction to the basic concepts of, and issues in, international human rights. Prior to World War II, there was very little focus on the question of human rights within the international system and within the discipline of international relations. Since that time we have seen a significant expansion of human rights theory, practice, and institutions. This course outlines the historical ideational and institutional developments of human rights. It exposes students to a range of theoretical propositions and empirical findings to understand the role (and limits) of human rights in the international system today.

(Spring) Transnational Social Movements in World Politics

How do multinational corporations, interest groups, NGOs, and social movements engage in world politics? In exploring this question, this course provides an introduction to the study of transnationally operating non-state actors and transnational social movements. First, we will look at the influence of movements on inter-state relations and on inter-national organizations. Second, we will investigate their increasing involvement in global governance. The class concludes with recent debates on the global economic crisis and conflict resolution and on global immigration, politicization, and democratization through social movements and new media.

IR-305-01 - International Relations - 2012-2013

(Spring) International Society - *Not offered this year/term

An intensive reading course in theories of international society: the idea that states and peoples are or should be linked to each other through a web of shared values and institutions. It focuses on the work of Hedley Bull, Immanuel Kant, and John Rawls. How did these three men understand international society? What are or should be the values and institutions that give rise to it and support it? What implications do their visions of international society have for war and peace, state sovereignty, religion, democracy, capitalism, distributive justice, human rights, and international law? What responses and criticisms have their arguments engendered?

(Fall) The Changing Role of Diplomacy in the Twenty-first Century

This seminar examines changes in the way U.S. foreign policy is implemented since the end of the Cold War. During the Cold War, U.S. foreign policy was made and implemented within established parameters of negotiation procedures with known international players. Today, it is adapting to more creative interactions with a range of new actors. This course analyzes specific challenges to U.S. foreign policy, such as dealing with ethnically driven conflicts and creating "coalitions of the willing" to respond to crises. Classroom simulations of interagency/international policy procedures are important course components.

(Fall) Liars, Pranksters, and Jesters on the Italian Stage

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English)

Can serious artists play cruel jokes? Who laughs at Dante? This course explores the role of lies and practical jokes in Italian literature and the way the concept of humor has changed over time. We will investigate the intimate connection among power, religion, and laughter by reading some of the funniest (and politically charged) works of Italian theatre. Our authors will take us through the streets of Renaissance Florence, eighteenth-century Venetian canals, as well as the improvised "factory theaters" of the seventies. Readings will be paired with stage performances and will include Dante, Machiavelli, Goldoni, Puccini, Fo, De Filippo, and Umberto Eco.

(Spring) A Different Language Is a Different Vision of Life: Contemporary Italy through Cinema

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

Film director Federico Fellini said that a "different language is a different vision of life." How has the Italian "vision of life" changed from Mussolini's dictatorship to Berlusconi's government? From the birth of the Republic in 1946 to the debate ignited by Roberto Saviano's bestseller Gomorra, this course traces transformations in modern Italian society. Through historical and literary readings, films, and the media, this course explores the difficult path towards modernity Italy has traveled in the last five decades. We will explore contemporary popular culture and films that reflect these transformations and analyze family, religion, gender, sexuality, and class conflict.

(Fall) Seminar in Romance Languages and Cultures: Topic: Don Juan, Valmont, Casanova: Iconic Latin Lovers

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English; Spanish 360, RLL 375, French 321)

Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student's choice.

If all is fair in love and war, are there rules for the game of power and seduction? As we move through the golden ages of absolute power in Spain, France, and Italy, will we witness a change for women? Students will explore such questions as they read plays by Tirso de Molina, José Zorilla, Molière, Beaumarchais, Goldoni; Mozart's opera Don Giovanni, and film versions of Dangerous Liaisons and Casanova's Memoirs. Students will be encouraged to explore works by major Spanish, French, and Italian artists of the Baroque and Rococo periods, and view relevant contemporary films such as The King is Dancing, and Goya's Ghosts. The final term project is a digital narration in the target language of the student.

Prerequisites: for language majors: two courses in culture and literature at the 200-level

Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French, Italian, or Spanish must read texts and write papers in the Romance language for which they wish to receive credit. This is a multimedia course where students achieve digital literacy. Technical support is provided in Audacity, Photoshop, iMovie, and iDVD, through scheduled workshops in LRC.

(Spring) Introduction to Judaism

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement
(Religion 212)

Judaism is a 3,500-year-old tradition that has developed over time as Jewish communities all over the world creatively interacted with the different cultural and historical milieus in which they lived. This course explores the ways in which Judaism has sought to transform ordinary life into sacred life. What are the ways in which Judaism conceives of God, and what is the meaning of life? What roles do study, prayer, ethics, sex, marriage, family, rituals of the life cycle, and community play in Judaism? These and other questions will be taken up through study of diverse types of religious literature and historical evidence.

(Spring) Jewish Spiritual Autobiographies - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement
(Religion 215s)

Along with such genres as letters, ethical wills, travel accounts, and other personal communications, spiritual autobiographies and diaries often reveal what people actually thought and felt about matters important to them. These sources provide insight into religion as lived experience. This course studies autobiographical accounts of Jewish religious figures from the medieval period to the contemporary. We include narratives by both women and men, philosophers, mystics, messianic pretenders, travelers, authors of Holocaust memoirs, and other contemporary Jews. Taken together, such accounts bring to life the diversity of spiritual quests in which Jews have engaged.

(Speaking-intensive; Religion 222-01, Gender Studies 210-01)

This course examines the representations and roles of women in Jewish culture, from the literature of the Hebrew Bible to the contemporary period. What were the distinctive ways in which women's religious life expressed itself by way of prayer and ritual practice? Were there women mystics and visionaries? How did women exert their influence as mothers and wives? There will be significant focus on the dramatic developments taking place among contemporary Jewish women: innovative rituals and experimental liturgies; opportunities to become rabbis; new approaches to God, theology, and social issues; the Jewish lesbian movement; women's writing and documentary filmmaking.

(Spring) Encounters Between Judaism and Other Religious Traditions: Christianity, Islam, and Buddhism

(Religion 249)

This course will explore selected examples of the encounter between Judaism and other world religious traditions. Living alongside other religious traditions over millennia, how have Jewish religious thought and practice creatively appropriated, adapted, as well as resisted aspects of "foreign" religions. Examples we will consider include encounters with medieval Islam in the realms of Arabic poetry and Sufi mysticism, Christianity in connection with religious ritual, mystical notions of the divine feminine, and in our own time, the influence of Buddhism on American Judaism.

(Spring) Cicero and the Enemies of the Roman Republic - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

The career of the Roman orator and statesman Marcus Tullius Cicero spanned the last generation of the Roman Republic, a period of political instability and civil war. As the leading orator of his day, Cicero often used his rhetorical skills to thwart those who he believed were bent on the destruction of the Roman Republic. In this course, we will examine the role of public oratory in the political process in this period with a close reading of Cicero's speeches and letters concerning one of his political enemies (Catiline, Clodius, or Mark Antony).

(Fall) Myth, Memory, and History: Writing the Past in the Roman Republic - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Livy and Sallust, the best known historians of the Roman Republic, viewed history writing as a moral enterprise, presenting events from the past as exemplary tales to inform and enlighten the lives of their readers. Their narratives thus are highly rhetorical, combining myth, memory, and history to reconstruct the past. Close reading of selections from Livy's Ab Urbe Condita and/or Sallust's monographs--the Bellum Catilinae and Bellum Jugurthinum--will lead to discussions about how Romans viewed their past and how they wrote about it.

(Spring) Views on Augustus - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

Augustus came to power after a long period of civil unrest. He restored order and stability and established a peace that would endure for more than two centuries. As Rome's savior and its first emperor, his accomplishments were the subject of biography, history, and even poetry. He is a complex historical figure who eludes simple interpretation. Yet we will try in this course to understand Augustus' character and accomplishments through a variety of sources, including Suetonius, Horace, and Augustus himself.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

High school algebra is essentially the study of the laws that govern the system of numbers we use for ordinary arithmetic. This course focuses on certain of these laws and studies the systems, called "groups," governed by them. Groups have beautiful properties and describe many phenomena: crystallography, graphic art, matrix algebra, counting, nuclear physics, codes, and more. The course studies the group laws and their consequences, as well as many examples of systems satisfying these laws.

(Fall) Explorations in Number Theory

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

We will cover the arithmetic of whole numbers and of prime numbers, in particular, examining some of the earliest questions in mathematics from a modern perspective, finding whole number solutions to equations with several variables, deciding whether or not such solutions exist and if so, determining whether the solution set is finite or infinite. Topics include the theory of "finite arithmetic," converting questions about the infinite set of whole numbers to those involving just a small set of primes, using computers to examine problems numerically.

Prerequisites: a good grasp of arithmetic

(Spring) Explorations in Number Theory - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Studies basic mathematical structures using as models symmetries of plane figures, the ordinary integers, and other number systems. Using examples to uncover patterns that help reveal and explain relationships. Solving simple equations in these new settings quickly brings students into contact with some intriguing problems being studied by contemporary mathematicians.

(Spring) Explorations in Geometry

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

The system of geometry devised by the ancient Greeks was immutable until the nineteenth century, when it was put in a broader framework better able to accommodate the varied interests of physical science and mathematics. In this course, we begin by a careful and close observation of what we can see and physically construct, reasoning informally about those observations. We will then explore a selection of geometry from the time of Euclid to the recent past, including curved surfaces and the hyperbolic plane.

(Fall) Making Meaning for Operations/Reasoning Algebraically about Operations

(Education 256)

This course will draw on two modules of the Developing Mathematical Ideas (DMI) series. DMI is a curriculum designed to help think through the major ideas of K-8 mathematics and examine how children develop those ideas. The first four sessions will parallel the first four sessions of Making Meaning for Operations. The remaining nine sessions will be based on the Reasoning Algebraically about Operations module. This module focuses on how children's study of operations leads into articulation of generalizations in the number system and justification of such generalizations. Participants will explore and understand how such work in the early grades relates to algebra studied in later grades.

MATH-329-01 - Mathematics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Topics in Geometry and Topology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

This is an introduction to point-set topology (also referred to as general topology). Point-set topology is one branch of the much broader area, topology. It is concerned with the study of properties of abstract topological spaces and structures related to such spaces. The material covered in this course will provide the common foundation for courses in algebraic topology, geometric topology, and differential topology. The core topics to be studied include: basic set theory, various interesting topologies, continuous functions, connectedness and compactness, separation axioms, countability axioms, nets and filters.

Prerequisites: Mathematics 203, one of Mathematics 211 or 251, or permission of the instructor

Notes: this course may be repeated for credit

MATH-339-01 - Mathematics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Topics in Applied Mathematics: Optimization

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Mathematical optimization involves finding the best solution to a problem from a set of feasible solutions defined by mathematical constraints. It has an elegant theory and applications in fields like management, economics, engineering, and computer science that require decision making under constraints on time or other resources. We will begin by studying linear optimization, including duality, the simplex algorithm, and the geometry of linear programming. Other topics will include discrete optimization, network optimization, and nonlinear optimization.

(Spring) Seminar in Medieval Studies: The Matter of Britain: the Grail in Arthurian Myth

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; English 316s(01))

This course focuses on the various forms the story of the grail takes in Arthurian legends from the twelfth to the twentieth centuries in the literature of England, France, and Europe. Centered in medieval English versions of the Arthurian myth, the course considers the political and cultural forces that helped shape the grail legend after the fall of Jerusalem in 1187, and over the course of the later Middle Ages, into the twentieth century. Reading from Malory, Tennyson and contemporary fiction as well as chronicles and romances.

(Spring) Seminar in Medieval Studies: Chaucer: Stories of Cupid's Martyrs - *Not offered this year/term

(English 311)

This course begins with a close reading of Chaucer's great love story Troilus and Criseyde together with The Legend of Good Women, taking into consideration the multiple cultural contexts a late medieval audience would have brought to both poems along with such topics as honour, love, trouthe, and betrayal. We will conclude by comparing Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida with Chaucer's work as a way of understanding the continuities and changes between a late medieval and early modern understanding of men and women in love and war.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

It is now possible to record, manipulate, notate, and compose music with a variety of powerful and flexible tools using the personal computer. This course will focus on hands-on experience with various sorts of music software, including recording and editing, mixing, synthesis and midi interfaces, notation, and various instructional programs. In the process of experimenting with these tools and operating on their favorite musical styles, students will learn a good bit of notation, ear training, and rudimentary principles of arrangement and composition. Basic computer literacy (such as comfort with basic editing commands and the concept of keyboard shortcuts) is required.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar

This course will address the questions: What is performance? What is stage fright? How does stage fright manifest itself? What fields and activities benefit from mastery of stage fright? What tools and methods exist to harness the effects of stage fright? Students will research performance and performers, as well as remedies for stage fright in all fields. Weekly performances will afford the opportunity to practice skills.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar: Women Composers of New England - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar

This course will explore women composers of the Second New England School, a loosely associated group of male and female musicians flourishing in the Boston area in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries. The careers of Helen Hopekirk, whose compositions reflected song literature of her native Scotland, and Amy Beach, who wrote prolifically in genres ranging from art song to symphony, will be featured. Through primary sources such as personal correspondence, reviews, interviews, diaries, and autograph scores, we will investigate the ambitions, achievements and frustrations of these and other women composers within the social and political contexts in which they lived and produced.

Notes: The ability to read music is not required. Basic concepts of music notation and theory will be included in the course.

(Fall) The Hyperbolic World of Opera in 25 Episodes -- An Introduction to Western Classical Opera from the Renaissance to the Present Day

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course begins with the birth of opera at the end of the Renaissance Period, and ends with some of the most successful operas in the past decade. Our investigation includes operas in English, French, German, Italian and Russian. Alongside an introduction to the materials of opera, from vocal fachs, forms, and styles, to vocal virtuosity, the course situates opera as a cultural phenomenon by considering the unique set of historical, intellectual, social, political and economic conditions of each work of art. The course includes some opera projections; each one is preceded by an introduction of the period in which it was first performed and is followed by class discussion.

(Writing-intensive)

This course is a survey of selected musical traditions from different parts of the world, including Africa, Indonesia, Indian, the Caribbean, and the United States. The course adopts an ethnomusicological approach that explains music as a cultural phenomenon, and explores the social and aesthetic significance of musical traditions within their respective historical and cultural contexts. It examines how musical traditions change over time, and how such changes reflect and relate to social and political changes within a given society. Weekly reading and listening assignments provide the basis for class discussions. Students are expected to undertake a final project in music ethnography.

(Fall) African Popular Music - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course examines selected genres and their relationships to the political and social dynamics of their respective national origins. Regional examples like highlife, soukous, chimurenga, and Fela Anikulapo-Kuti's Afro-beat will provide the basis for assessing the significance of popular music as a creative response to the African colonial and postcolonial environment. The course also discusses African hip-hop music by exploring how indigenous cultural tropes have provided the basis for its local appropriation. Themes explored include music and identity; music, politics, and resistance; interaction of local and global elements; and political significance of musical nostalgia.

(Spring) Psychology of Music

(Psychology 245)

Every culture in the world has some form of music, but why did music evolve, and what function does it serve? In this course, we will explore the cognitive and neural processes that underlie music perception and production to ask the following questions: Does music have universal features that cross cultures? How does music convey emotion? What do infants know about music? Is music specifically human? And finally, what are the parallels between music and language? Through these questions, we hope to discover something about the origin of music and what makes it such an integral part of our daily lives.

Prerequisites: 100 level course in Psychology or permission of instructor

Notes: Does not count towards the music major or minor or distribution in Humanities. Formal music training not required.

Neuroscience and Behavior

NEURO-100-01 - Neuroscience and Behavior - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introduction to Neuroscience and Behavior

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This comprehensive survey course explores the brain and the biological basis of behavior. We will examine the anatomy of the nervous system and the unique properties of the cells that make up the brain. We will discuss the mechanisms by which individual brains cells communicate with each other, and how small networks of cells underlie more complex processes such as perception, learning, and behavior. In labs, students will perform experiments that expand upon and reinforce these ideas through hands-on exercises.

Prerequisites: fy or permission from Gary Gillis

(Spring) Biology of Neurological Diseases

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Biology of Neurological Diseases will explore the molecular and cellular basis of neurological diseases. We will investigate the biological mechanisms underlying neurodegenerative diseases such as Alzheimer's and Parkinson's disease, in addition to Multiple sclerosis and other diseases of the nervous system. We will discuss animal models used to investigate the pathogenesis of these diseases and the biology underlying therapeutic strategies. This seminar course will rely heavily on primary research articles, in-class discussions and student-led presentations.

Philosophy

PHIL-101-01 - Philosophy - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introduction to Philosophy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course will explore topics that philosophers have grappled with for thousands of years, and that still undergird (or sometimes threaten to undermine) our understanding of the world, our knowledge, ourselves, and each other. In historical and modern texts of the Western intellectual tradition, we will discuss questions such as: What exists? What knowledge can we claim? What are people like? What is, or should be, our role in the world? In considering these answers, we will learn to do philosophy ourselves, developing our own careful reflections on these issues.

(Fall) First-Year Seminar on Topics in Philosophy: God, Morality, and Freedom

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course will introduce students to philosophy and its methods by looking at what philosophers, past and present, have said about three important and interrelated topics: God, morality, and freedom. We will ask questions such as: Does God exist? Is it rational to believe in God? What should I do if I want to do the right thing? When is it ok to criticize other cultural practices? How much do I owe to others? Do we have free will? Can we ever be held responsible for anything? The hope is that students will emerge from this course better thinkers, better writers, and better equipped to tackle difficult questions like these with rigor and care.

PHIL-103-01 - Philosophy - 2012-2013

(Spring) Comparative Introduction to Philosophy - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

In this course, questions concerning views of the self, humans in relation to one another, and humans in relation to the non-human world will be explored by bringing together conventional philosophy texts with culturally diverse philosophical writings. Through these questions and the materials which address them, issues of ethnicity, race, class, and gender will impact our discussion of various perspectives on fundamental problems.

(Spring) Philosophical Foundations of Western Thought: The Modern Period

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Investigates the development of Western philosophy in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries through the writings of Descartes, Locke, Leibniz, Hume, and Kant. Focus on the apparent conflict between modern natural science and traditional religion as sources of knowledge and belief. Topics include the nature and extent of human knowledge, the nature of the mind, the existence of God, and the possibility of human freedom.

PHIL-205-01 - Philosophy - 2012-2013

(Fall) Ethics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course will focus on classic and contemporary work on central topics in ethics. The goal will be to see whether there is anything to be said in a principled way about what to do and how to live. The core of the course will be an examination of the central traditions in moral philosophy in the West, typified by Aristotle, Kant, and Mill. We will also examine vexing contemporary moral issues with an eye to whether moral theories can give us practical guidance. Finally, we will step back and ask whether any of the moral theorizing we have been engaging in is really capable of uncovering objective moral truths.

(Spring) Knowledge and Reality

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course is an introduction to the central topics in epistemology (theory of knowledge) and metaphysics (theory of reality). It will look at questions such as: How is knowledge possible? What is knowledge? Do we know anything? Is time real? What makes you the same person now and in ten years? Could things be otherwise than they are?

PHIL-210-01 - Philosophy - 2012-2013

(Fall) Logical Thought

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course cultivates sound reasoning. Students will learn to see the structure of claims and arguments and to use those structures in developing strong arguments and exposing shoddy ones. We will learn to evaluate arguments on the strength of the reasoning rather than on the force of their associations and buzzwords.

Instructors: L. Bowie

PHIL-220-01 - Philosophy - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introduction to the Philosophy of Science - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Scientific theories come and go--what was once believed true is often later thought false. What then is the status of current scientific theories? What makes a theory "good"? How do we know whether accepting a theory is based on scientific reasoning--rather than scientific or nonscientific rationales? In what ways does science in practice depart from scientific ideals? This course will explore answers to these questions proposed by scientists and philosophers of science. We will study some historical views, but will focus on scholars writing in the 1960s through the present.

(Spring) Symbolic Logic

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course develops a symbolic system that can be used as the basis for inference in all fields. It will provide syntax and semantics for the language of this system and investigate its adequacy. It provides the basis for all further work in logic or in the philosophical foundations of mathematics. Much of the course has a mathematical flavor, but no knowledge of mathematics is necessary.

(Fall) Introduction to the Philosophy of Religion - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Religion 226-01, Critical Social Thought 250f-01)

This course begins its survey of the discipline of the philosophy of religion with the work of Augustine. We then proceed to an examination of the classical theistic arguments for knowledge of God's existence (those of Anselm, Aquinas, and Maimonides) that dominated Scholastic thought and consider the criticisms of these approaches by Enlightenment philosophers such as Kant. We trace the rise of experience as the central category of pietism and romanticism in Schleiermacher's Speeches. Finally, we focus on the idealistic and pragmatic tradition in American philosophy of religion.

(Fall) Ethical Issues in Complex Organizations - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Complex Organizations 232)

There is much talk recently of the need for increased attention to "ethics" in organizational life. This course examines the basis for this concern and the underlying beliefs and structures that give rise to ethical issues, with the goal of helping students to clarify their own positions. Topics addressed will include profit, governance, consumption, distribution, and the social contract. Readings will draw on philosophy, religion, economics, history, literature, management theory, and current events

(Fall) Medical Ethics - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Modern medicine has raised new and difficult moral and philosophical problems. Topics discussed include: What is the distinction between health and illness? How should limited health care resources be distributed? How are medical problems related to larger social problems (e.g., gender inequality)? What are the responsibilities of medical researchers toward their research subjects? What moral reasons do we have to be concerned about the growth of technology in medicine? Are the basic institutions of medicine and medical education just?

(Spring) Environmental Ethics: Nature/Culture/Values - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Community-based learning course)

A fundamental problem we face as humans is how we should relate to the natural world. Why not turn Yosemite into a parking lot? Should we control nature by applying scientific and technological expertise? Or should we strive for noninterference and preservation of the wild? How do we balance the pressing needs of people for food, energy, and other resources with the needs of other species or whole ecosystems? Students will explore these questions and issues in the classroom and in community-based learning or other experiential projects that put ideas into action.

(Fall) Social and Political Philosophy - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

An examination of a variety of topics in social and political philosophy, drawing from historical as well as contemporary sources. We will examine questions such as the following: What is the nature and scope of political authority? Do citizens have a duty to obey the laws of their state? What duties do we have to oppressed and marginalized groups? How do race, class, gender, and sexual orientation matter to political freedom and authority?

How should we balance political liberties against the public good? Attention will also be given to the application of these questions to particular contemporary social and political issues.

(Spring) Philosophy and Literature

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course examines philosophical themes in literature and philosophical questions about literature. Can literature yield knowledge about the world? What is the meaning of a work of literature, and how can we know it? Are the author's intentions relevant to how a work is to be interpreted? Can works of literature be immoral? How is the identity of the reader relevant to the understanding of a literary work? What is the difference between philosophy and literature - can a work of literature also be a work of philosophy?

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

An introduction to discussions of "race" within philosophy and related discussions in science, the law, and the arts. Topics to be discussed include: Is "race" real, subjective, or produced by society? How is race relevant to our identities? How does the popular media represent "race?" Does science construct "race?" What is the connection between "race," gender, and class? Readings from philosophy and a variety of interdisciplinary texts, including film and literature.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Gender Studies 210s(01))

This course will focus on three topics to which feminist thinking has made important philosophical contributions: pornography, objectification, and consent. We will draw on a variety of philosophical resources, ranging from liberal and feminist political theory, to speech act theory. We'll be looking at work by Simone deBeauvoir, Ronald Dworkin, Sally Haslanger, Rae Langton, Catharine MacKinnon, Martha Nussbaum, and others. The goal will be to see how careful philosophical thought can help us with pressing issues of gender.

(Fall) Philosophical Foundations of Western Thought: The Nineteenth Century - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course explores the ways the nature, possibility, and extent of human freedom were conceptualized by German philosophers in the nineteenth century. Readings are drawn from the work of Hegel, Feuerbach, Marx, and Nietzsche. Specific topics include Hegel's metaphysics of spirit, Feuerbach's critique of religious and philosophical mystification, Marx's analysis of alienation, and Nietzsche's ideal of the "Over-Man."

(See Critical Social Thought 253f(01), Afram-208f(01))

This course examines the discursive relationship between race and law in contemporary U.S. society. Readings examine the ways in which racial bodies are constituted in the cultural and political economy of American society. The main objective is to explore the rules and social practices that govern the relationship of race to gender, nationality, sexuality, and class in U.S. courts and other cultural institutions. Thinkers covered include W.E.B. DuBois, Kimberle Crenshaw, Derrick Bell, and Richard Delgado, among others.

(Fall) Existentialism

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

Is life absurd? Do human beings really want to be free? Or do we prefer to sacrifice our freedom for comfort and amusement? Is God dead? Is it possible to live without religious belief? These are among the central questions about human life raised by existential thinkers. We will discuss these issues, and many others, through careful reading of philosophic and literary texts by such important existentialists as Søren Kierkegaard, Friedrich Nietzsche, Martin Heidegger, Jean-Paul Sartre, Albert Camus, Simone de Beauvoir, and Franz Fanon.

(Spring) Controversies in Public Health

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Biology 265)

This course takes an interdisciplinary approach to the discussion of public health issues. The class will be co-led by a philosopher and a biologist, with additional guest experts offering a variety of disciplinary and professional perspectives on some of the most complex and vexing current public health issues. Topics may include: the hazards and benefits of vaccination programs; effective responses to and prevention of natural disasters; obesity, food policy, nutrition, and health; the controversy over hygiene and the rise of allergic and chronic diseases; or the impact of public policy and ethics on reproductive rights. Selected topics will be scrutinized through both a biological and a philosophical lens, with the intersections and divergence of those perspectives highlighted.

Prerequisites: most seats will be reserved for sophomores

Notes: Some attendance at college speaking events will be required.

(Fall) Philosophy of Language - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

In the twentieth century, problems in the philosophy of language have become central to nearly all philosophical concerns. This course addresses key questions: What is truth? What is it for a sentence to have a meaning? Does language determine the way we think? Readings are drawn from Frege, Russell, Wittgenstein, Whorf, Quine, Chomsky, Frye, and others.

(Film Studies 290s)

An exploration of philosophical issues encountered in the study of film. Why do we need a theory of film? What is a film anyway? Do films have "authors"? How do films engage our emotions? Can films be socially critical? What can we learn from films? These are examples of the topics to be discussed in this course as we investigate the nature of film and its relation to philosophy. There will be weekly required film screenings.

PHIL-280-01 - Philosophy - 2012-2013

(Fall) Philosophy for Children

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Community-based learning course; Speaking-intensive)

When you act bravely, can you be scared? How do you know that you are not dreaming now? If everyone told you you weren't a person, would you believe them? These questions are raised by children's books, such as Frog and Toad Together and The Bear That Wasn't. In this course, you will learn how to conduct discussions of philosophical questions like these among elementary school children using picture books. The first half of the course will concentrate on developing the necessary skills; the second on teaching philosophy to the children. Along the way, we'll delve into a range of philosophical issues, as we prepare to teach an introductory philosophy course for second graders.

(Spring) Seminar in Philosophy of Language - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

How do words come to mean things? Frege introduced two aspects of meaning: reference, that is, whatever expressions pick out in the world, and sense, a publicly accessible means by which expressions pick out their references, which must be grasped by all speakers. This course is an extended examination of the concept of sense, the uses to which it has been put, and the criticisms that have been lodged against it. We'll look at Frege's work, the complaints made by Quine and Kripke, Davidson's theory of meaning, and Dummett's defense of sense.

(Fall) Non-Classical Logic

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course looks at the recent flowering of non-classical logics. The most prominent are modal logics concerning necessity and possibility, which have come to dominate work in metaphysics and epistemology. Conditional logics, intuitionist logics, and relevance logics have also become important. These logics are particularly useful in graduate-level classes in philosophy but also are interesting in their own right.

(Fall) Topics in Philosophy: The Ethical Theories of Aristotle and Mengzi

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

This course will be an examination of the ethical works of two philosophers working on different continents at approximately the same time, the fourth century BCE: Aristotle and Mengzi. We will mainly study two texts: Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, and the work eponymously called Mengzi. Each of these philosophers is attempting to set out and defend a particular view about virtue (for Aristotle, areté; for Mengzi, dé). What makes for virtuous action, or character? How does one become (or fail to become) a virtuous person? We will critically examine Aristotle and Mengzi's answers to these and other questions.

(Spring) Philosophy of Art: Illustration

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Art Studio 280(01))

Preamble (for topics courses): This class examines philosophical issues concerning the interpretation, creation, and experience of art. Topics vary from year to year.

Illustrations are all around us, in picture books, scientific texts, fine art editions of books, magazines, and in the pockets of airline seats. Yet there is little philosophical discussion about what constitutes an illustration. In this seminar, we will approach the topic of illustration through both theory and practice. There will be readings, viewings, and studio sessions. Participants will be expected to take part in this approach, producing both theoretical and studio work. Our approach will be eclectic, hoping to educate our eyes, minds, and bodies about this important use of images.

Prerequisites: 8 credits in department

Notes: Students enrolled in this course will be responsible for some of the cost of course materials, in addition to the standard studio fee of $60.

(Spring) Philosophy of Film - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Film Studies 390-02)

Preamble (for topics courses): An examination of different theoretical issues concerning the nature of film and film viewing. Topics vary yearly.

Recently, philosophers have argued that films resemble philosophy in their use of thought experiments. But the role of thought experiments in philosophy is itself contested. The seminar will investigate how thought experiments are used in science and philosophy in order to determine whether films and, more generally, art can legitimately claim that their presentation of thought experiments connects them to philosophy. Some previous acquaintance with philosophy highly recommended.

(Spring) Bon Odori (Japanese Spiritual Dance)

Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course focuses on a Japanese Buddhist folk dance performed outdoors and danced in a concentric circle around a raised platform. It is celebrated as a reminder of the gratefulness one should feel toward one's ancestors. From this dance of joy comes Bon Odori, a time in which ancestors and their sacrifices are remembered and appreciated. Through studying the dance, students will understand its intentions: remembering and appreciating who you are and where you come from. Because the dance is closely related to Buddhism, this course will provide an opportunity for the students both to exercise through dancing and to calm their minds.

PE-139-01 - Physical Education and Athletics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Ultimate Frisbee - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 1; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This is a non-contact sport played by two seven-player teams. The object of the game is to score goals. The Frisbee may only be moved by passing; the thrower is not allowed to take any steps. When a pass is incomplete, intercepted, etc., a turnover occurs, resulting in a change of possession of the disc. A goal is scored when a player successfully passes the disc to a teammate in the end zone which that team is attacking.

Physics

PHYS-100-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Foundations of Physics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course studies a variety of topics in physics unified by the physical notions of force, energy, and equilibrium. Mathematics is used at the level of geometry, proportion, and dimensional analysis. Topics, drawn from the MCAT syllabus, include geometrical optics, time, oscillation, statics, elasticity, conservation of energy, and fluids.

(Spring) Renewable Energy

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

(Environmental Studies 104)

We will examine the feasibility of converting the entire energy infrastructure of the US from one that is dependent on fossil fuels to one that utilizes mostly renewable sources of energy. We will examine the potential scale of energy production and the associated costs, natural resource requirements and land usage needs for both renewables, such as solar, wind and biofuel, and non-renewables, such as coal, natural gas, petroleum and nuclear. By applying extensive use of basic algebra and an elementary understanding of the physical processes underpinning each energy technology, we will arrive at a number of urgent conclusions about the challenges facing our energy infrastructure.

(Fall) Science in the Media - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

First-year seminar

Popular coverage of science ranges in depth and accuracy, and many scientists do not see the importance of communicating their work, or their excitement, to the general public. Scientific breakthroughs contribute to everyone's quality of life, but the process is poorly understood by many, leading to misunderstandings and misgivings that can affect public policy. This course will look at newsworthy results from current scientific research, exploring topics to better understand the science, ideas such as scientific consensus and repeatability, and examining the tension that may exist between the scientists and the public. Topics will be pulled largely from the physical sciences.

PHYS-150-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Phenomena of Physics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course studies a variety of topics in physics, drawn from the MCAT syllabus, including thermodynamics, acoustics, wave optics, electricity, magnetism, and nuclear phenomena. As in Physics 103/100, the applicable mathematics is geometry, proportion, and dimensional analysis.

Prerequisites: Physics 103/100 or 115/110

Instructors: J. Burciaga

Section Instructors: 01 LAB The department | 02 LAB The department |

PHYS-200-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introduction to Mathematical Methods for Scientists

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Topics include infinite series, complex numbers, partial differentiation, multiple integration, selected topics in linear algebra and vector analysis, ordinary differential equations, and Fourier series. The course includes a brief introduction to Mathematica and Matlab, in addition to a traditional emphasis on analytic solutions.

Prerequisites: Physics 216/190 or concurrent enrollment

Instructors: A. Arango

Section Instructors: 01 LAB The Department | 02 LAB The Department |

PHYS-210-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Waves and Optics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement

A comprehensive treatment of wave phenomena, particularly light, leading to an introductory study of quantum mechanics. Topics include wave propagation, polarization, interference and interferometry, diffraction, and special relativity.

Prerequisites: Physics 216/190 and either 303/200 or concurrent enrollment in 200

Instructors: J. Burciaga

Expected enrollment: 30

(Spring) Gender in Science - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Gender Studies 241)

This course examines explanations for the underrepresentation of women in science, technology, engineering, and math (STEM) with an eye to identifying how to increase the participation of women in science. The course will address questions about gender differences in cognition and ability, the role of stereotyping, as well as the "leaky pipeline" issue, that is, the rate and timing of the departure of women from scientific fields. Course readings will explore the psychology of gender, as it relates to STEM. In addition, we will read research from physical scientists, reports from professional organizations such as the American Physical Society, and reports from congressional committees.

(Fall) Intermediate Lab in Physics - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This lab-based course is an introduction to modern, investigative, experimental physics. The course is intended as a bridge between the structured introductory lab experience and independent research. Students will engage in a semester-long experimental project, participating in experimental design, construction, debugging and implementation. Students will practice presenting and interpreting experimental results and will be encouraged to develop follow-up experimental questions of their own. This course will also introduce students to scientific communication skills, and is speaking- and writing-intensive.

Prerequisites: Physics 303/200 and 301/210, or Physics 303/200 and concurrent enrollment in Physics 210

Instructors: The department

Expected enrollment: 24

(Spring) Comparative Biomechanics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

(Biological Sciences 322)

The main objective of this course is to explore organismal structure and function via an examination of the basic physical principles that guide how living things are constructed and how organisms interact with their environment. We will use the combined approaches of the biologist and engineer to study the impact of size on biological systems, address the implications of solid and fluid mechanics for animal design, survey different modes of animal locomotion, and learn how biologists working in diverse areas (e.g., ecology, development, evolution, and physiology) gain insight through biomechanical analyses.

PHYS-250-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Quantum Mechanical Phenomena

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-C: Natural and physical sciences without lab requirement
This course provides an introduction to quantum mechanics. The Uncertainty Principle, Schroedinger's Equation, and the hydrogen atom are studied in depth, with emphasis on angular momentum, electron spin, and the Pauli Exclusion Principle.
Prerequisites: Physics 301/210 and 303/200
Instructors: N. Abraham

PHYS-290-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Advanced Laboratory Practicum

Credits/PE Units: 1-8; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.
(Speaking- and writing-intensive)
This course is a hands-on practicum, intended to introduce students to the practice of modern physics research. Depending on student interest, topics include external research seminars by practitioners in the field, training in oral and written scientific communication, presentation and interpretation of research results, scientific modeling, and hands-on experimental skills. Research projects are an integral part of this course; credit will be apportioned in relation to the intensity of the project.

PHYS-308-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Electronics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-B: Natural and physical sciences with lab requirement

This course is a study of electrical circuits and components with emphasis on the underlying physical principles; solid-state active devices with applications to simple systems such as linear amplifiers; feedback-controlled instrumentation; and analog and digital computing devices.

Prerequisites: Physics 216/190

Notes: 2 meetings (3 hours: hands-on lecture and lab combined)

Instructors: K. Aidala

Expected enrollment: 12

PHYS-315-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Analytical Mechanics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

Newton's great innovation was the description of the world by differential equations, the beginning of physics as we know it. This course studies Newtonian mechanics for a point particle in 1, 2, and 3 dimensions, systems of particles, rigid bodies, and the Lagrangian and Hamiltonian formulations.

Prerequisites: Physics 303/200

Instructors: J. Burciaga

Expected enrollment: 22

PHYS-324-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Spring) Methods of Applied Mathematics - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Mathematics 324s)

This course is an introduction to theories and techniques important to applied mathematics. Topics include special functions, calculus of variations, theory of functions of a complex variable, solution of partial differential equations, integral transform methods, and Green's functions. While the focus of the course is on analytical techniques, we will develop numerical approaches to problem solving.

Prerequisites: Physics 216/190, 303/200

Notes: Physics 324 or 336 will normally be offered in alternating years

Expected enrollment: 25

PHYS-325-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Electromagnetic Theory

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course presents the development of mathematical descriptions of electric and magnetic fields; study of interactions of fields with matter in static and dynamic situations; mathematical description of waves; and development of Maxwell's equations with a few applications to the reflection and refraction of light and microwave cavities.

Prerequisites: Physics 303/200

Instructors: J. Burciaga

Expected enrollment: 25

PHYS-326-01 - Physics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Statistical Mechanics and Thermodynamics - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

This course presents thermodynamic and statistical descriptions of many-particle systems. Topics include classical and quantum ideal gases with applications to paramagnetism; black-body radiation; Bose-Einstein condensation; and the Einstein and Debye solid; the specific heat of solids.

Prerequisites: Physics 303/200 and 302/250 or permission from department

Instructors: K. Aidala

Politics

POLIT-100-01 - Politics - 2012-2013

(Fall) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Speaking and Arguing: The Rhetoric of Peace and War

First-year seminar (Speaking-intensive)
The art and mechanics of persuading a polity to support either war or peace through oral argument. How speeches frame issues, mobilize public opinion, and persuade individuals to support or resist decisions to go to war. Students will be expected to deliver speeches, lead discussions, and critique their own and others' presentations.

(Spring) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Family Ties

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

In this course, students will engage a number of classic works of literature and philosophy, as well as contemporary works, in order to reflect on the ways the family shapes private and public life and is, in return, shaped by them. We will cover such questions as: how does the family create and then influence the individual? What does it mean to be part of a family? What do individuals owe their families and are those obligations fair? How do we form families? Can the family insulate individuals from politics and society--in good ways and bad? Is political order like familial order? Are the state and society a threat or support for the family? How have these understandings changed over time?

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Critical Social Thought 100 (02))

What is the relationship between personal experience and political thought? How do political thinkers grasp and convey the connections between self and political order? Our first-year seminar will probe the links between heart and mind in political philosophy by exploring the lives and writings of illustrative figures who together span the history of political thought. Texts will include memoirs and fiction as well as abstract theoretical works.

(Spring) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Black Metropolis: From MLK to Obama

First-year seminar

"Black Metropolis" refers to the more than half a million black people jammed into a South Side ghetto in Chicago at mid-twentieth century that featured an entrenched black political machine, a prosperous black middle class, and a thriving black cultural scene in the midst of massive poverty and systemic inequality. This course will follow the political, economic, and cultural developments of what scholars considered to be the typical urban community in postwar United States. We will examine such topics as Martin Luther King's failed desegregation campaign; Harold Washington, first black mayor; William Julius Wilson's urban underclass thesis; and the rise of Barack Obama.

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

A critical examination of the political and economic forces informing the production, distribution, marketing, and consumption of food in the United States. We will look at the power relations and institutional arrangements that inform what we eat. Topics include the industrialization of food production and its impact on workers, public health, and the environment; animal welfare, veganism, and other ethical issues; the marketing of unhealthy diet choices; and corporate influence over agricultural policy and food regulation. We will also consider various individual, cultural, and policy solutions to the problems surrounding food and diet in America.

(Fall) First-Year Seminars in Politics: Politics and Truth - *Not offered this year/term

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

What is the relationship of truth to our political life? Does democracy require truth? Or can democracy pervert truth? Can truth thrive in any type of government? Are these issues more or less relevant for contemporary politics? This course is an introduction to political theory through an examination of these questions. During the semester, students will examine a variety of political theory classics, analyzing the authors' perspectives on these questions.

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive)

We know the world faces several profound problems that may well threaten the long-term sustainability of life as we know it: environmental degradation and resource limits, deepening global inequality, global corporate capitalism, and ineffective national and international political institutions. To respond wisely, we must understand the complex interlocking systems we loosely name contemporary globalization. Only then will we be able to imagine appropriate responses and solutions

This course examines the politics surrounding minority rights in the US since World War II, with special emphasis on the politics of race, class, gender, sexuality, and citizenship/immigration. Our aim will be to trace the accomplishments and limitations of the American state in offering full democratic inclusion to all members of the polity. Through readings, lectures, discussions, and film screenings, we will analyze several public debates related to contemporary minority inclusion. In the process, we will evaluate such behemoths of minority politics as affirmative action, same-sex marriage, and the Americans with Disabilities Act (1990).

(Spring) Ancient and Medieval Political Thought - *Not offered this year/term

Through the works of the ancient tragedians and comedians, Thucydides, Plato, Aristotle, Cicero, Seneca, Augustine, Aquinas, and Pizan, this course explores themes in ancient and medieval political thought. In alternating years, the course will be taught as either a survey of a wide array of authors or as a more thematically focused study of just a few writers. In either format, we will pay particular attention to the ways these writers characterized the relationship between the individual and community; the roles knowledge, reason, emotion, and rhetoric play in political life; the link between gender and citizenship; and the various forms political community can take.

(Spring) Nationalism

(Taught in English; Russian and Eurasian Studies 330)

Nationalism is one of the greatest challenges to multiethnic states. They have had to create new strategies to deal with the demands of ethnic minorities. Taking the four states of Spain, Canada, Russia, and the former Yugoslavia as examples, we will focus on nationalist movements within these states and the central governments' responses. What has been the effect of the Communist legacy? Are there alternatives to federalism as a way of managing national claims? What socioeconomic policies have governments used to control ethnic tensions? What role can international organizations play in finding solutions to ethnic conflict?

(Fall) Democratization and Civil Society in East Asia

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course examines the dramatic emergence of democratic institutions and civil society in East Asia. The primary aim of the class is to help students understand and analyze the process of democratic unfolding in Japan, Korea, and Taiwan. We will also evaluate China's recent, albeit limited experiments with democratic practices. We will begin by contrasting Western perspectives of democracy with both traditional and more contemporary Asian understandings of democracy. We will then focus on the actual processes of democratic consolidation in each of the cases, especially the developments that precipitated political crisis and ultimately, political change.

(Spring) Politics and Rhetoric

(Writing-intensive)

People have long accused politicians of using rhetoric to pander to audiences and get what they want regardless of the truth. But democratic politics depends on communication to persuade and motivate others. In this course, we will analyze classical writings on rhetoric, contemporary democratic political theory, and hear from professionals in order to probe the relationship between rhetoric and politics. Students will also engage in an extended campaign simulation, in which they devise, implement, and react to campaign rhetorical strategies. In addition to our weekly seminar meeting, there is a required fourth hour. Prior work in political theory is required and prior work in American Politics is strongly recommended.

Prerequisites: jr. sr. with permission of instructor. 8 credits in politics, including at least one theory course required.

Societies pride themselves on being civilized when they transcend rule by violence and implant rule by law. Civilized societies pride themselves on being liberal democracies when they recognize the political equality of all citizens, represent the interest of those citizens in government, and make decisions through peaceful deliberation and compromise. But what exactly is violence, and what is wrong with it? Does it entail physical force, or can violence be present when bloodshed is absent? Is violence a means to power, an expression of powerlessness, or both? Is justice always served by the exit of violence from social life? Are liberal democracy and violence truly antithetical?

(Spring) Introduction to Psychology

How do we make decisions, form attachments, and learn a language? Can we inherit schizophrenia? Why are we fearful of some situations and not others? What factors influence the way we form attitudes or develop prejudices? This course addresses such questions to provide an overview of current research in psychology.

Instructors: K. Haydon

PSYCH-110-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introductory Seminars in Psychology: The Social Psychology of Stereotyping, Person Perception, and Intergroup Relations

First-year seminar

This course will be an in depth examination, from a social psychological perspective, of how stereotypes are formed, how stereotypes influence prejudice and racism, and how stereotypes, prejudice, and racism influence our relationship with others. Classic and contemporary research will be examined. Students will be expected to write brief reaction papers to weekly readings, as well as complete a final paper and presentation on a topic of their choosing.

Instructors: T. Cain

Expected enrollment: 16

PSYCH-110-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Introductory Seminars in Psychology: Understanding Mental Health

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

First-year seminar (Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Why do some people have serious mental health problems while others don't? What explains the racial/ethnic differences in the diagnosis of psychiatric disorders that emerge from cross-cultural research? How do current debates about treatment affect research and clinical practice? Are there parallels between physical and mental health? We will consider these and many related questions, through readings, textual analysis, debates, and oral presentations.

Instructors: G. Hornstein

Expected enrollment: 14

PSYCH-110-02 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introductory Seminars in Psychology: Brain/Mind - *Not offered this year/term

First-year seminar

What are the relationships between the structure and activity of our brains and how we think, feel, perceive, remember, and communicate? How does experience shape both our brains and our development as unique individuals throughout our lives? In discussing such questions, we will explore how the brain functions; the role of conscious and unconscious processes in determining our behavior; and how neurodegenerative disease or traumatic injury to the brain can fundamentally alter a person's abilities and sense of self.

Instructors: J. Cohen

Expected enrollment: 16

PSYCH-200-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Research Methods in Psychology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course provides an introduction to the skills necessary for becoming good producers and consumers of psychological research. Students learn to develop research questions, survey related literature, design rigorous and ethically sound studies, and collect, analyze, and interpret quantitative and qualitative data. Students build on their computer skills relevant for psychological research and learn to read and critique original empirical journal articles. The course culminates in an original, collaborative research project, a final paper, and an oral presentation.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology AND Psychology 201 or Statistics 240

Notes: students must take statistics (Psychology 201) before enrolling in this course; students should sign up for the lecture course and one lab section

Instructors: K. Binder

PSYCH-210-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Social Psychology

This course surveys a range of topics within social psychology. How do other people influence us? How do people perceive one another? How do attitudes develop and change? Under what conditions do people conform to, or deviate from, social norms? We will survey concepts across several areas of social psychology with an emphasis on empirical research evidence.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology

Instructors: J. Salvatore

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-211-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Psychology of Women

(Speaking-intensive; Gender Studies 212F-01)

A multicultural feminist analysis of women's lives around the world. Emphasizing the diversity of women's experience across ethnicity, social class, and sexuality, this course examines existing psychological theory and research on women. In the fall, the course will have a strong international emphasis.

Prerequisites: 100 level course in psychology

Instructors: F. Deutsch

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-212-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Individuals and Organizations

(Spring) Psychology of Racism - *Not offered this year/term

How do the theories of race and racism correlate with the lived experiences of people of color? In what ways are whites affected by a system that privileges whiteness? This course will explore the mind, behavior, and impact of racism on targeted and privileged racial groups and the subsequent movements of liberation from historical, conceptual, intrapersonal, and interpersonal levels. We will mine the subjective experiences of the authors, looking both for damage and resilience, and we will use this data to help us understand racism's impact on the psyches of those whom it targets and benefits.

Instructors: The department

Expected enrollment: 25

PSYCH-220-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Theories of Personality

(Speaking-intensive)

How do theorists' ideas about personality relate to their own life experiences? Does the gender of a theorist affect the claims they make about women's and men's personalities? Autobiographical writings of key theorists (Freud, Jung, Horney, Deutsch) are read in conjunction with their classic works, with an eye toward exploring how people are similar to, and different from, one another and how childhood experiences shape adult behavior.

Prerequisites: soph, jr or sr & Psychology 100,101 or 110

Instructors: G. Hornstein

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-222-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Abnormal Psychology: Perspectives on Disorders

(Gender Studies 212 (02))

This course will provide an overview of psychological disorders and research on the etiology and treatment of these disorders. The course will consider and evaluate the concept of "abnormality," with particular emphasis on intersections of mental health and disorders with culture, race, class, and gender.

Prerequisites: 100-level psychology course; soph. jr. sr.

Instructors: A. Douglas

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-225-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Psychoanalytic Theory

(Speaking-intensive; Critical Social Thought 251)

An introduction to the contested terrain of psychoanalytic theory, which has so hugely influenced twentieth-century thought. Reading widely across Freud's work and that of his colleagues, we will situate key ideas--repression, desire, masochism, neurosis, sublimation, feminine/masculine personality, etc.--within a range of interpretive frameworks. Intensive class discussions, oral presentations, and small group projects will allow students to analyze the varied implications of psychoanalytic theory for contemporary thinking about individuals and society.

Prerequisites: soph, jr, sr and one course in either psychology or critical social thought

Instructors: G. Hornstein

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-230-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Developmental Psychology

Examines changes in cognitive, social, and emotional functioning, including theory and research that illuminate some central issues in characterizing these changes: the relative contributions of nature and nurture, the influence of the context on development, continuity versus discontinuity in development, and the concept of stage. Includes observations at the Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology

Instructors: K. Haydon

(Fall) Educational Psychology

(Community-based learning course; Education 233fs)

What do we learn? How do we learn? Why do we learn? In this course, we will study issues of learning, teaching, and motivation that are central to educational psychology. We will explore the shifting paradigms within educational psychology, multiple subject matter areas, (dis)continuities between classroom and home cultures, students' prior experiences, teachers as learners, ethnic and gender identity in the classroom, and learning in out-of-school settings. Requires a prepracticum in a community-based setting.

Prerequisites: soph, jr or sr

PSYCH-241-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Cognitive Psychology

Cognition encompasses a range of phenomena that define our mental lives. This course considers empirical investigations and theoretical accounts of cognitive issues, including learning and memory, creativity and problem solving, decision making, attention, consciousness, and language.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology

Instructors: K. Binder

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-245-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Psychology of Music

(Music 245)

Every culture in the world has some form of music, but why did music evolve, and what function does it serve? In this course, we will explore the cognitive and neural processes that underlie music perception and production to ask the following questions: Does music have universal features that cross cultures? How does music convey emotion? What do infants know about music? Is music specifically human? And finally, what are the parallels between music and language? Through these questions, we hope to discover something about the origin of music and what makes it such an integral part of our daily lives.

Prerequisites: a 100 level course in Psychology or permission of instructor. Formal music training is not required for the course

Instructors: M. Breen

PSYCH-250-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Introduction to the Biological Bases of Behavior

(Neuroscience and Behavior 250s)

This course is an introduction to and survey of the biological bases of behavior, including physiological, biochemical, and neurophysiological determinants of sensation, motor control, sleep, eating and drinking, learning and memory, language, and mental disorders.

Prerequisites: Psychology 100; Biological Sciences 145 or 160 recommended

Notes: This course is not appropriate for students who have already taken Neuro 100.

Instructors: S. Tershner

Expected enrollment: 50

PSYCH-251-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Animal Behavior

(Speaking-intensive)

Examines the development, causal mechanisms, evolutionary history, and function of the behavior of animals. Topics include sensory capacities, predator evasion, reproduction, parental care, social behavior, and learning.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology; soph. jr. sr. or permission of instructor

Instructors: K. Hollis

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-300-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Seminar in History and Systems of Psychology: Controversies in Psychology

(Speaking-intensive)

Why can't psychologists agree on basic assumptions? Why is so much of the field still controversial after more than a century? This seminar gives advanced psychology and neuroscience students a broad conceptual and historical overview of their discipline through an analysis of its enduring disputes. We will analyze primary source materials (both historical and contemporary) on several sides of major controversies such as: Are there racial differences in intelligence? Is madness rooted in faulty biology? Do women's brains differ from men's? Is violence innate or learned? Each student will have the opportunity to research a controversy of particular interest to her.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in Psychology, 200, 201, plus 8 additional credits in the department. Preference given to senior psychology and neuroscience majors

Instructors: G. Hornstein

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-310-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Laboratory: Research Methods in Social Psychology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course is an introduction to laboratory and field methods in social psychology: methodology, data analysis, ethical problems, statistical inference, and research design. All students are expected to design and conduct a research project.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and permission of instructor. Students must email Prof. Deutsch during advising week to explain why they want to take the course

Instructors: F. Deutsch

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-310-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Lab in Social Psychology: Psychology of Attraction and Close Relationships

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course provides an introduction to research methods in social psychology, with an emphasis on the psychology of attraction and close relationships. Students will learn how to develop research questions and hypotheses, conduct literature reviews, design studies, collect and analyze data, and interpret and report research results. In addition, students will learn about topics such as relationship initiation, attachment, interpersonal conflict, and relationship quality, as well as develop and practice critical thinking, reasoning, and communication skills.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, Psychology 201 and 200

Instructors: L. Beck

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-319-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Seminar in Social Psychology: Gender and Domestic Labor - *Not offered this year/term

(Gender Studies 333s(04))

This course examines social psychology and sociological theories and research addressing why women do more housework and child care than men. It pays special attention to the situation of dual-earner families and considers class and ethnic differences on the nature of this inequality and the barriers to full equality at home.

Prerequisites: permission of instructor. Students must meet with instructor during advising week to get permission to enter the course

Instructors: F. Deutsch

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-323-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Laboratory in Qualitative Research

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This course offers a hands-on introduction to methods of psychological research that focus on the qualitative description and analysis of human experience. Students learn a variety of techniques of data collection (interviewing, intensive observation, archival research) and methods of analyzing textual sources -- from historical accounts to blogs, memoirs, observational narratives, and interview transcripts. Readings focus on specific methodological practices as well as on the history and philosophy of science differentiating qualitative methods from other approaches to psychological research. Students work both collaboratively and individually on projects throughout the course.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and permission of instructor. Students must meet with Prof. Hornstein during advising week

Notes: This course also counts in the Social area of psychology.

Instructors: G. Hornstein

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-326-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Laboratory in Personality and Abnormal Psychology - *Not offered this year/term

This course is an introduction to research methods in abnormal and personality psychology. Students will work as a class to collect data using quantitative and qualitative methodologies. Students will be expected to collect survey- and questionnaire-based data as well as engage in some interviewing projects. We will consider the various stages of research including literature review, design, ethical considerations, data collection, and analysis (qualitative and quantitative), and consider the statistical inference or implications of our findings. The course focuses on the impact of stress and coping on the lives of individuals, identity, their relationships, and psychological adjustment.

Prerequisites: Jr. sr., Psych 200, 201; one course in the personality/abnormal area preferred, and permission of instructor

Instructors: A. Douglas

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-328-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Depression and Anxiety

This seminar will take a largely clinical perspective on the mental health problems of depression and anxiety. We will examine the traditional definitions of these diagnoses from the DSM and raise questions about the nature of diagnosis and the way diagnoses change over time. We will look at how differently depression and anxiety are understood and treated given differences in gender, race, culture and age. Finally, the course will touch on past and present treatment of depression and anxiety. Theoretically we will focus on the psychoanalytic and cognitive behavioral understanding and treatment of depression and anxiety. Case studies will help us make sense of theoretical insights.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, and Psych 220 or Psych 222

Instructors: M. Fingrutd

Expected enrollment: 15

PSYCH-329-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Seminar in Personality and Abnormal Psychology: Psychology of Trauma

(Gender Studies 333f(C))

What happens after a traumatic event? Why do some people develop psychological disorders and others do not? This course will explore the psychological theories and research on trauma and stress. Topics covered will include childhood abuse, domestic violence, combat violence, community violence, and interpersonal violence. The seminar will explore psychological dysfunction, disorders, as well as adaptation and coping following exposure to traumatic stress. In addition, the course will explore the concept of "cultural trauma."

Prerequisites: 100 level psychology course; Psychology 200; jr or sr. A course in abnormal psychology preferred

Instructors: A. Douglas

Expected enrollment: 40

PSYCH-330-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Lab in Developmental Psychology: Psychological Perspectives on Adoption

Adoption has become a common way to create families in the United States and many other countries. The experience of adoptees, birth parents, and adoptive families raise many questions about family relationships, identities, and community membership. In this course we will look how adoption has been studied, with a particular focus on the experiences of adoptees and their adoptive parents. Students will develop research questions, consider different methods and related ethical issues, and analyze survey and interview data.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200; 201; and 230 or 236.

Instructors: P. Ramsey

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-330-02 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Spring) Lab in Developmental Psychology: Laboratory in Romantic Development: Observational Coding Methodology

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

Students will work in teams to code videotaped observations of romantic conflict discussions. Students will learn to code emotion expressions, conflict engagement and resolution strategies, attachment behaviors, and relationship quality at both the dyadic and individual levels. Students will also write their own coding scales to apply to these observations. Issues of coding bias, construct validity, and intercoder reliability will be addressed. Emphasis will be on conceptual and methodological aspects of developing, coding, and analyzing observational data for individuals and individuals nested within dyads.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201; 230 or 236 and permission of instructor.

Notes: During advising week students must submit a statement to the professor saying why they want to take the course.

Instructors: K. Haydon

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-331-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Lab in Early Social and Personality Development

In the role of a participant-observer, each student studies intensively the social and personality development of the children in one classroom at the Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook. Students learn how to articulate developmental changes and individual differences by analyzing detailed observations. Topics include social cognition, peer relationships, social skills, concepts of friendship, emotional development, identity formation, self-esteem, and the social and cultural context of development.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201, and 230 or permission of instructor

Notes: 2 labs (3 hours each) required at Gorse Children's Center at Stonybrook

Instructors: A. Grillo

Expected enrollment: 18

(Fall) Seminar in Developmental Psychology: Close Relationships across the Lifespan

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course will cover developmental implications of close relationships from infancy through adulthood with a focus on parents, friendships, and romantic partners. The goal is to examine normative developmental processes through a relational lens.

Prerequisites: jr, sr, and Psychology 230

Instructors: K. Haydon

Expected enrollment: 15

(Fall) Laboratory in Perception and Cognition: Cognition and Literacy

(Community-based learning course)

Adult illiteracy in the U.S. presents an ever-growing challenge. To understand this problem, we will learn various theories of reading. However, since many models of reading are based on data gathered from children, we will also examine how the cognitive abilities of adults are different from those of children. A large component of this class concerns learning the lab techniques associated with assessing reading abilities. In addition, since this is a community-based learning course, each student will become a tutor for an adult enrolled in an area literacy program.

Prerequisites: a 100-level course in psychology, 201, 200 and permission of instructor. Students must meet with the professor during advising week to get permission to enter the course.

Notes: 3 hours per week as a literacy tutor in Springfield is required.

Instructors: K. Binder

(Spring) Laboratory in Perception and Cognition: Speech

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

This course presents an overview of laboratory methods in cognitive psychology, including: research design, methodology, data analysis, and statistical inference. We will explore these issues through the lens of human communication; specifically, speech. Students will design and complete a research project in which they record and analyze speech to explore questions about how meaning is expressed through spoken language.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200 and 201

Instructors: M. Breen

Expected enrollment: 12

PSYCH-349-01 - Psychology - 2012-2013

(Fall) Seminar in Perception and Cognition: Language and Thought

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

Languages differ in the way they describe the world. For example, the noun for bridge is feminine in German, but masculine in French. Russian has two words for blue, while English has only one. The Piraha (an Amazonian hunter-gatherer tribe) arguably have no number words. In this course, we will be asking to what extent these cross-linguistic differences are reflected in thought. That is, do German speakers think bridges are more feminine than French speakers do? Can Russian speakers discriminate different shades of blue better than English speakers? Can the Piraha count? In exploring these questions, we hope to discover how tightly linked language and thought are.

Prerequisites: Psychology 200, 201, and 241

Instructors: M. Breen

(Fall) Making Meaning for Operations/Reasoning Algebraically about Operations

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Does not meet a distribution requirement.

(Mathematics 156)

This course will draw on two modules of the Developing Mathematical Ideas (DMI) series. DMI is a curriculum designed to help think through the major ideas of K-8 mathematics and examine how children develop those ideas. The first four sessions will parallel the first four sessions of Making Meaning for Operations. The remaining nine sessions will be based on the Reasoning Algebraically about Operations module. This module focuses on how children's study of operations leads into articulation of generalizations in the number system and justification of such generalizations. Participants will explore and understand how such work in the early grades relates to algebra studied in later grades.

(Jewish Studies 204)

This course investigates the social and historical context of first and early second-century Christianity, examines New Testament and select non-canonical documents, and introduces participants to the principal methods of New Testament studies. Students will read the works that make up most modern collections of the New Testament, a number of early Christian documents that did not make the final cut, and several ancient non-Christian sources. Examples of recent New Testament scholarship will provide historical background for better understanding of Christian writings and will present different methods for approaching and interpreting ancient texts.

(Spring) Issues in Islamic History: Classical Islamic Civilization

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-B requirement

(History 204s(01))

Preamble (for topics courses): This course explores Islamic religious history and issues that have been of religious and cultural significance to Muslims in various eras.

We will examine the development of Islamic civilization from the time of the Prophet Muhammad to the sixteenth century. Particular attention will be paid to the political structures of the caliphates, the process of conquest and conversion, and interaction with non-Muslim cultures. Literature, art, architecture, and philosophical and scientific works of classical Islamic civilization will be used as primary sources for this course.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Jewish Studies 212)

Judaism is a 3,500-year-old tradition that has developed over time as Jewish communities all over the world creatively interacted with the different cultural and historical milieus in which they lived. This course explores the ways in which Judaism has sought to transform ordinary life into sacred life. What are the ways in which Judaism conceives of God, and what is the meaning of life? What roles do study, prayer, ethics, sex, marriage, family, rituals of the life cycle, and community play in Judaism? These and other questions will be taken up through study of diverse types of religious literature and historical evidence.

(Jewish Studies 215)

Along with such genres as letters, ethical wills, travel accounts, and other personal communications, spiritual autobiographies and diaries often reveal what people actually thought and felt about matters important to them. These sources provide insight into religion as lived experience. This course studies autobiographical accounts of Jewish religious figures from the medieval period to the contemporary. We include narratives by both women and men, philosophers, mystics, messianic pretenders, travelers, authors of Holocaust memoirs, and other contemporary Jews. Taken together, such accounts bring to life the diversity of spiritual quests in which Jews have engaged.

(Gender Studies 210s(02))

This course explores women and Buddhism during different historical periods and in different cultures. Through a variety of sources, this course will illuminate Buddhist concepts of gender and sexuality, views of women's spiritual capacities, the diversity of women's images, roles, experiences, concerns, and contributions in Buddhist societies, and scholarly approaches to women in Buddhism. Special attention will be given to how gender is constructed in each cultural and religious context encountered, with particular emphasis on Buddhist women in Southeast Asia. We will look into the reasons why texts on religion have not always included the voices of women, and we will investigate ways to uncover them through research techniques and alternative hermeneutical strategies.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Gender Studies 333-F)

Mary Daly, Elisabeth Schussler Fiorenza, Phyllis Trible, and Judith Plaskow, among others, have argued that traditional Jewish and Christian theological systems have overlooked the needs, concerns, histories, and contributions of women. Their challenges range from the historical modification of a presumably unbiased religious system to the outright rejection of a so-called patriarchal establishment. Whatever their approach, feminist theologies offer diverse and incisive tools for understanding how a theological system operates, how transitory cultural assumptions become embedded in ongoing doctrines, and how apparently minor adjustments can have significant ripple effects.

This course examines contemporary Buddhist movements in Southeast Asia with particular focus on how Buddhist scholars, activists, practitioners, and leaders have (re)interpreted sacred texts and practices to find guidance in the face of modernization, globalization, and a secular economic world order. We will explore the Buddhist world and cultural change in Southeast Asia, the changing role of monks and the laity in the face of modernization, modern reform movements, the role of women, and Buddhism in the West. Students will do a research paper on some aspect of Buddhist thought and practice embedded in the cultures of Thailand, Myanmar (Burma), Laos, Cambodia, or Sri Lanka.

Notes: This course counts toward Asian Studies major.

(Spring) Creation vs. Evolution - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

A distinctive mark of Western thought in the nineteenth century was its fascination with "the origin of things." The origin of the species and the origin of the universe are two prime examples. These two concerns, in particular, had a decisive impact on how religion and science came to be understood and expressed in the twentieth century. As a consequence of the ensuing public debate, this question of "origins" presented a direct challenge to the received theory of creation, the meaning of miracles, as well as the nature of biblical inspiration.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English; Spanish 105(02))

Preamble (for topics courses): Seminar in Reading Writing and Reasoning taught in English

Political, social, and economic life was radically changed by growth of Europe's cities between medieval and modern times. These changes were debated in sexual terms as conflicts between men and women. As we study short stories from Early Modern France (Madame de Lafayette), Italy (Giovanni Boccaccio), and Spain (Miguel de Cervantes and María de Zayas), and place them in their historical contexts, we will ask questions such as: To what extent do these works challenge or reinforce dominant models of gender relations and negotiate concepts and institutions such as marriage, honor, patriarchy, and blood purity? How do those topics apply to us today?

(Fall) Seminar in Romance Languages and Cultures: Topic: Don Juan, Valmont, Casanova: Iconic Latin Lovers

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English; Spanish 360, Italian 361, French 321)

Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student's choice.

If all is fair in love and war, are there rules for the game of power and seduction? As we move through the golden ages of absolute power in Spain, France, and Italy, will we witness a change for women? Students will explore such questions as they read plays by Tirso de Molina, José Zorilla, Molière, Beaumarchais, Goldoni; Mozart's opera Don Giovanni, and film versions of Dangerous Liaisons and Casanova's Memoirs. Students will be encouraged to explore works by major Spanish, French, and Italian artists of the Baroque and Rococo periods, and view relevant contemporary films such as The King is Dancing, and Goya's Ghosts. The final term project is a digital narration in the target language of the student.

Prerequisites: for language majors: two courses in culture and literature at the 200-level

Notes: Note: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French, Italian, or Spanish must read texts and write papers in the Romance language for which they wish to receive credit. This is a multimedia course where students achieve digital literacy. Technical support is provided in Audacity, Photoshop, iMovie, and iDVD, through scheduled workshops in LRC.

(Fall) The Romanovs: Triumph and Tragedy

(Taught in English; History 205)

We will study defining periods in Russian and world history with an emphasis on the powerful Russian monarchs who shaped them: in particular, Peter the Great, Catherine the Great, Alexander II, and Nicholas II. Russia's tsarist system raises important questions about the nature of the monarchy. The Russian case shows how monarchies can change and develop, and why, ultimately, many of them failed. Why did the Romanovs fail when their relatives, the House of Windsor, did not? Could Russia have survived as a constitutional monarchy? What is the role of a royal dynasty in defining nationhood?

(Fall) Great Books: The Literature of Nineteenth-Century Russia

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

In no other culture has literature occupied the central role it enjoyed in nineteenth-century Russia. Political, social, and historical constraints propelled Russian writers into the roles of witness, prophet, and sage. Yet, far from being limited to the vast, dark "Big Question" novels of legend, Russian literature offers much humor, lyricism, and fantasy. We will focus on the Russian novel as a reaction to western European forms of narrative and consider the recurring pattern of the strong heroine and the weak hero. Authors will include: Pushkin, Lermontov, Gogol, Turgenev, Tolstoy, Dostoevsky, and Chekhov.

(Fall) Topics in Twentieth-Century Russian Literature: The Culture of the Cold War: Atom Bombs, Show Trials, Witch Hunts, and Alien Invasions

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

No other historical event so affected the psyche of the post-WWII world as the standoff between "The Free World" and "The Evil Empire." This course brings two bitter enemies - the Soviet Union and the United States - back together in a final battle. Like the Cold War, this one will be fought through proxies: the literary, cinematic, and cultural texts of the two Super Powers. It addresses the ideologies and paranoia that divided the world into an "us" and a "them," and the terror and lunacy that the bomb, spy mania, and witch-hunts evoked. What was it like to loathe and be drawn to "the enemy"? What are the sources of "Cold War nostalgia"? Are there connections between the Cold War and the current political climate?

(Spring) Topics in Twentieth-Century Russian Literature: Doctor Zhivago: A Poet in History

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

Combining epic sweep with lyrical intensity, Doctor Zhivago is a great writer's look back at a turbulent epoch in his country's history. Set in Russia's revolutionary years, Boris Pasternak's novel is a testament to the survival of life, love, art - and the possibility of freedom even under the most difficult conditions. This course will situate a close reading of Pasternak's novel within the various contexts (biographical, political, literary) relevant to understanding this major, but sometimes mysterious, work of Russian fiction.

(Spring) Russia

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-B requirement

(Taught in English; History 212s)

This course examines pivotal archetypes of Russian civilization that reflect Russia's past, demarcate its present, and constrict its future. We will focus on the canonic historical monuments of Russia, such as the Kremlin of Moscow and the downtown of St. Petersburg. Starting with the representation of these landmarks in the media, we will explore them in depth by reading conflicting historical narratives and cultural histories and eventually deconstruct their cultural message and value. By the end of the course, students will be familiar with the Eastern Orthodox Christianity rites and able to identify and discuss the most common artifacts of Russian civilization.

(Spring) Dostoevsky and the Problem of Evil: The Brothers Karamazov

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English)

Perhaps no other novelist has delved as deeply into the psychological and metaphysical dimensions of evil as the Russian novelist Fyodor Dostoevsky. This course will be devoted to a close reading of Dostoevsky's landmark novel of murderous passion and parricide, The Brothers Karamazov. Why should crime and transgression be a privileged avenue of access into the human interior? How is psychology tied to the metaphysical aspect of human existence? What are the sources of evil--and redemption?

(Taught in English; Politics 264f)

Since its creation at the beginning of the twentieth century, the Soviet Union dominated the minds of Western foreign policymakers. None of the West's policies in the Middle East, the Third World, Europe, or China after World War II can be understood without the study of Soviet foreign policy. We will examine the development of Soviet foreign policy since 1917 and, following the collapse of the USSR in 1991, the role played by Russia and Russia and the former Soviet republics in the far more complex and multipolar "New World Order." What should U.S. policy be toward the emerging new states of the Baltics, Central Asia, and Caucasia?

(Taught in English; Politics 242s)

Following the collapse of the USSR and the Gulf War, Central Asia and the Caucasus became new centers of geopolitical rivalry. The new states are a source of energy (oil and gas) for Western powers and a vital transit corridor between Eastern Europe and China. While a new "Great Game" is being fought between Western, Far Eastern, and Middle Eastern powers for control over energy pipelines, the region is threatened by environmental catastrophe and water shortages. Is the new oil industry a source of prosperity or an instrument for exploitation, corruption, and instability? How important are the new states to the West's strategic energy interests?

The Bolshevik Revolution of 1917 marked the coming of totalitarianism to Russia. Led first by Lenin and then by Stalin, the country went through the most brutal civil war, purges, World War II, and the first stages of cold war. This period also saw immense social change and sweeping economic transformation. What were the causes of totalitarianism in Russia? How did the regime function? (Fall) Advanced Russian Language: From Reading to Speaking

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement; does not meet a distribution requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): We will study a variety of texts and set them into the cultural context that marks them as distinctly Russian. Texts will be selected from a broad range of genres and sources. Readings, discussions, short oral and written reports. Special attention to complex grammatical constructions and vocabulary building. Taught in Russian.

This course aims at expansion of students' vocabulary and improvement of both writing and speaking skills. The course is intended for students who have completed at least four semesters of Russian or the equivalent. Heritage learners of Russian (those who speak the language) will also benefit from the course. With a strong emphasis on integrating vocabulary in context, this course aims to help students advance their lexicon and grammar, increase fluency, and overcome speaking inhibitions. We will read and discuss a variety of texts including short stories, films, and articles.

(Taught in English; Politics 312)

The silk roads were ancient transportation and trade links that wound their way across the Eurasian continent, or by sea through the South China Sea and Indian Ocean, to Europe. They carried silk, glass, jade, and moved religions and literatures across continents. Today, the new silk roads carry oil, gas, drugs, capitalism, and immigrants seeking better lives. We will investigate the parallels between the ancient and modern silk roads and the contemporary strategic, cultural, and economic significance of these new highways, which link China, Central Asia, the Middle East, South Asia, and Europe.

Nationalism is one of the greatest challenges to multiethnic states. They have had to create new strategies to deal with the demands of ethnic minorities. Taking the four states of Spain, Canada, Russia, and the former Yugoslavia as examples, we will focus on nationalist movements within these states and the central governments' responses. What has been the effect of the Communist legacy? Are there alternatives to federalism as a way of managing national claims? What socioeconomic policies have governments used to control ethnic tensions? What role can international organizations play in finding solutions to ethnic conflict?

Russia was the first nation in the world to face political terrorism. In Russia, the era of terrorism lasted from the 1860s, when the People's Will group launched the hunt on the tsar Alexander II, until 1918, when the Socialist Revolutionary Party attempted to assassinate Lenin. A case study of terrorism in Russia will help us to answer a number of questions highly relevant today. What are the causes of terrorism? What are its goals and methods? What can governments do to cope with it? What is the impact of terrorism on society?

Revolution is far from over. First came the explosion in Eastern Europe, the collapse of the USSR, the rise of the Taliban in Afghanistan, bloodless overthrows of old elites in Indonesia and the Philippines, and what Hugo Chavez calls the Bolivarian revolution in Venezuela. The goal of revolutions may no longer be socialism, it may not even be directed at greater liberty. But revolutions continue to affect millions of people's lives and reflect states' responses to global change and social dislocation. They are still with us as the Arab Spring so clearly demonstrated. We will examine revolutions, their beginnings, their victories, and their ends.

Revolutions have a rich and bloody history on the European continent. In the twentieth century, there were frequent revolutionary upheavals, particularly in Russia and Eastern Europe. We will study two revolutionary periods: Russia in 1917 and the USSR in 1991. These revolutionary events present great contrasts, yet at the same time clarify the nature of revolutions and why they occur. Do they bring the expected fundamental and accelerated change people hope for? Our focus will be on the contrasts and parallels between Russia's early twentieth-century socialist revolution and late twentieth-century capitalist revolution. (Fall) Racial and Ethnic Relations

In this course students will be introduced to the various sociological perspectives and theoretical frameworks used to understand racial and ethnic relations in the United States. Racial and ethnic identities remain an important aspect of how people view themselves and others. In this course, we will discuss the dynamics of individual racial and ethnic groups including African Americans, Latino Americans, Native Americans, Asian Americans, and White Americans. We will also examine what the concepts of race and ethnicity mean and how they affect various aspects of American society.

(Fall) Issues in Sociology: Sociology of Popular Culture

There is little question that popular culture occupies a central role in the contemporary social world. For some scholars, popular culture serves a social function akin to traditional religion, acting as a form of social solidarity by promoting collective ideas, experiences, and identities. A more critical approach views popular culture as a form of ideological domination, promoting the interests of certain social groups at the expense of others. This course will examine these theories by exploring both the social factors that help influence the production and consumption of popular culture as well as the ways in which popular culture itself helps shape society.

(Spring) Special Topics in Sociology: Sociology of Media

This course provides an overview of sociological research on mass media. Students will explore the social impact of mass media from several different scholarly perspectives, including the early Chicago School, the Columbia School tradition, the Frankfurt School tradition, field theory, and more recent work from cultural sociology. The relationship between democracy and the media will be a central theme throughout the semester. The course concludes with an investigation into the possible strengths and limitations of new media formats, including blogs and social media. To help gain a stronger understanding of mass media's social impact, students will develop their own research projects that analyze the manner in which a particular type of mass media covers a specific topic or issue.

(Fall) Criminology

This course focuses on the historical and theoretical development of the major approaches to crime and criminality. Criminology began in the second half of the nineteenth century when its pioneers asked the "big questions" pertaining to crime, society, and human nature. As criminology progressed, it narrowed its focus, concentrating on special areas, such as violent crime and property crime. As sociology began to dominate criminology, new theories were developed to explain the social facts gathered in the last 50 years.

(Spring) Class in the Black Community

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Social Sciences III-A: Anthro, econ, geog, etc. requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): This course focuses on significant problems in the field of sociology with group meetings and reports.

This course explores class in the black community from a sociological perspective. It focuses on how race fosters commonalities and how class fuels differences among blacks. We will examine the nature of these commonalities and differences within several contexts, such as neighborhoods, politics, work, and culture.

(Fall) Social Inequality

This course is a critical survey of theoretical and empirical research on social inequality, stratification, and mobility. The central focus is class, race, and gender inequalities as they have changed during the post-World War II period in the United States (although we will look briefly at stratification regimes in other cultures and time periods). The concepts and methods of social stratification have wide application in sociology, economics, public policy, and administration contexts. As the course progresses, we will explore some of these applications as we wrestle with several policy issues currently confronting U.S. society.

(Fall) First Year Seminar: Sex and the City: Gender-Power Relations in Early Modern Europe - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Taught in English; Romance Languages 105)

Political, social, and economic life was radically changed by growth of Europe's cities between medieval and modern times. These changes were debated in sexual terms as conflicts between men and women. As we study short stories from Early Modern France (Madame de Lafayette), Italy (Giovanni Boccaccio), and Spain (Miguel de Cervantes and María de Zayas), and place them in their historical contexts, we will ask questions such as: To what extent do these works challenge or reinforce dominant models of gender relations and negotiate concepts and institutions such as marriage, honor, patriarchy, and blood purity? How do those topics apply to us today?

SPAN-212-01 - Spanish - 2012-2013

(Fall) Preparation for Advanced Studies

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

This course will equip students of Spanish with a variety of skills that prepare them for upper-division courses. Specific areas of study will include introduction to literary genres and movements; practice in critical reading and writing; study of figures of speech, rhetoric, and style; presentation of oral reports; use of library resources. In addition, students acquire basic knowledge of the geography, history, and culture of the Hispanic world.

Prerequisites: Spanish 202 or 209 or 210, or permission of instructor

Instructors: D. Mosby

(Fall) Identities and Intersections: An Introduction: The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly: Women in the Spanish Empire

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 204-01)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to issues of identity (gender, sexual, ethnic, cultural, class, national, religious) in the Spanish-speaking world and their intersections with other dimensions of cultural agency and power differentials. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

During the Spanish Empire (sixteenth-eighteenth centuries), witches, prostitutes, transvestite warriors, and daring noblewomen and nuns violated the social order by failing to uphold the expected qualities of the ideal good woman and/or the expected sexual morality of the time. They were criticized, punished, and even burned at the stake. Students will study contradictory discourses of good and evil and beauty and ugliness in relation to women and their place in history. We will analyze historical and literary examples of so-called "bad" women in the Spanish Empire, such as Celestina, María de Padilla, Catalina de Erauso, and Sor Juana Inés de la Cruz.

(Spring) Identities and Intersections: An Introduction: Constructing (Our) America

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to issues of identity (gender, sexual, ethnic, cultural, class, national, religious) in the Spanish-speaking world and their intersections with other dimensions of cultural agency and power differentials. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

Who are we? This is the question that Latin American writers, artists, philosophers and politicians have attempted to answer through fiction, nonfiction, visual arts, and film. Through representative cultural texts from figures such as D. F. Sarmiento, José Martí, Gabriela Mistral, Marta Rojas, and Hugo Chávez, we will explore discourses of identity, different sociopolitical positions, and the representation of race and gender in the construction of "latinoamericanidad."

(Fall) Visual Cultures: An Introduction: Double Takes: Women's Artistic Production in Contemporary Latin America

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Gender Studies 240-02)

Preamble (for topics courses): A broad introduction to the study of visual representation in Latin American, Spanish, and U.S. Latina/o cultures. Students will examine the articulation of a variety of topics in media such as film, television, fine arts, Internet, and/or video. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

As women perform gender, so too do they perform culture. In this course we will explore the links between gender and modern Latin American culture, through a study of nineteenth through twenty-first century feminist critical theories and self-representations. We will look at the construction of the female subject and her double, or "other," through travel writing, political writing, revolutionary testimonies, plays, and letters alongside the plastic arts. In addition to primary texts and media, we will read gender and queer theory to disentangle the complexity of women's representations as they intersect with race, class, ethnicity, and sexuality. Students will produce creative projects as well as essays.

(Fall) Concepts and Practices of Power: An Introduction: "Backwards? Rethinking (Under)Development in the Spanish-Speaking World"

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

Preamble (for topics courses): A historical approach to the analysis of political discourses and economic relations in Latin America, Spain and Latina/o cultures in the United States. Topics may include, but are not limited to, imperialism, (post/neo)colonialism, (trans)nationalism, migration, globalization, and neoliberalism. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

When and how did the notion of "development" emerge and spread? Why does nearly every country now aspire to it? What stigmas and hierarchies does the term "underdevelopment" imply? Throughout the Spanish-speaking world, "development" has proved problematic not only as a material reality but also as a framework for understanding place, time, and selfhood. For that very reason, Latin American countries and Spain are ideal places from which to question commonly accepted understandings of "development" (and associated concepts such as "modernization" and "progress"). In this course, students rethink "development" through the study of a variety of writers and filmmakers from several countries.

(Spring) Concepts and Practices of Power: An Introduction: Fighting Words: Imperial Discourses and Resistance in the Americas

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Preamble (for topics courses): A historical approach to the analysis of political discourses and economic relations in Latin America, Spain and Latina/o cultures in the United States. Topics may include, but are not limited to, imperialism, (post/neo)colonialism, (trans)nationalism, migration, globalization, and neoliberalism. The specific course contents and examples examined will vary each semester.

In 1492, the Spanish conquest forever changed indigenous America and created a "new" world. European imperial discourses collided with resistance movements and the emerging voices of oppressed peoples, including indigenous communities, women, and mestizos. This course traces the tensions between imperialist and resistance discourses during both the colonial period and today. We will analyze the "fighting words" that consolidated the Spanish empire and later opened the path to Latin American independence. Tracing the impact of these struggles on the Americas today, we will examine how subaltern communities strive to make their voices heard in the global context.

(Fall) Advanced Studies in Identities and Intersections: Afro-descendant Social Movements: Identity, Discourse, and Culture - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive; Gender Studies 333D)

As democracy expanded in Latin America in the 1990s and 2000s, so did neoliberal policies that disproportionately affected Afro-descendant populations, particularly the lives of Afro-descendant women. This course will examine Afro-descendant social movements, the discourse of human rights, land tenure, cultural citizenship and identity politics through a variety of interdisciplinary texts. Particular emphasis will be placed on Afro-descendant women. Readings are required before the first day of class.

(Spring) Advanced Studies in Visual Cultures: Ahead of the Times: Transatlantic Theories of the Avant-Garde

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

Are you avant-garde? To be "avant-garde" once meant to be "ahead of your time" or to be situated along the cutting edge of an artistic or political movement. In the first part of the twentieth-century, a cadre of artists in Europe as well as in Latin America put forward subversive critiques of art by considering innovative form and content as political tools for change. In this class we will read avant-garde artists from Spain and Latin America alike to explore the productive tensions between peninsular and Latin American trends as well as between art and activism, theory and practice. We will look at movements like Dadaismo, Modernismo, Surrealismo, and Indigenismo and consider the relevance of the avant-garde today.

(Spring) Advanced Studies in Visual Cultures: Memory (of) War

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking- and writing-intensive)

The Spanish Civil War (1936-1939) and the repressive, right-wing military regime of Francisco Franco (1939-1975) have shaped contemporary thought and cultural production in Spain. Cinema in particular shows a persistent concern with war and memory. The films studied in this course raise a number of philosophical and political questions to this effect. How does the devastation of war register through the medium of film? How do censorship and propaganda condition memory, and how does the past return in a postdictatorship? What and why do people choose to remember or to forget? Films to be studied include both mainstream commercial features and experimental works, and range in genre.

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Community-based learning course; Speaking- and writing-intensive)

This Community-Based-Learning course examines how digital storytelling enables communities to express themselves and to gain social visibility through literary and media discourses. How do traditionally marginalized communities tell their own stories? Together with the Springfield-based Latino Youth Media Institute, students will research and produce digital stories on issues that affect the North End community in Springfield. Throughout the semester, students will alternate classroom instruction and fieldwork.

(Fall) Seminar in Romance Languages and Cultures: Topic: Don Juan, Valmont, Casanova: Iconic Latin Lovers

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Language requirement or Humanities I-A requirement

(Taught in English; Romance Languages 375, Italian 361, French 321)

Preamble (for topics courses): This interdisciplinary seminar will focus on a comparative study of Romance languages or literatures. Topics will vary from semester to semester. Seminar discussions will be conducted in English, but students wishing to obtain language credit are expected to read works in at least one original language. Papers will be written in either English or the Romance language of the student's choice.

If all is fair in love and war, are there rules for the game of power and seduction? As we move through the golden ages of absolute power in Spain, France, and Italy, will we witness a change for women? Students will explore such questions as they read plays by Tirso de Molina, José Zorrilla, Molière, Beaumarchais, Goldoni; Mozart's opera Don Giovanni, and film versions of Dangerous Liaisons and Casanova's Memoirs. Students will be encouraged to explore works by major Spanish, French, and Italian artists of the Baroque and Rococo periods, and view relevant contemporary films such as The King is Dancing, and Goya's Ghosts. The final term project is a digital narration in the target language of the student.

Prerequisites: for language majors: two courses in culture and literature at the 200-level

Notes: Students wishing to obtain 300-level credit in French, Italian, or Spanish must read texts and write papers in the Romance language for which they wish to receive credit. This is a multimedia course where students achieve digital literacy. Technical support is provided in Audacity, Photoshop, iMovie, and iDVD, through scheduled workshops in the Language Resource Center.

STAT-140-01 - Statistics - 2012-2013

(Fall) Introduction to the Ideas and Applications of Statistics

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

This course provides an overview of statistical methods, their conceptual underpinnings, and their use in various settings taken from current news, as well as from the physical, biological, and social sciences. Topics will include exploring distributions and relationships, planning for data production, sampling distributions, basic ideas of inference (confidence intervals and hypothesis tests), inference for distributions, and inference for relationships, including chi-square methods for two-way tables and regression.

(Fall) Elementary Data Analysis and Experimental Design

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

A fundamental fact of science is that repeated measurements exhibit variability. The course presents ways to design experiments that will reveal systematic patterns while "controlling" the effects of variability and methods for the statistical analysis of data from well-designed experiments. Topics include completely randomized, randomized complete block, Latin Square and factorial designs, and their analysis of variance. The course emphasizes applications, with examples drawn principally from biology, psychology, and medicine.

(Spring) Linear Statistical Models - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Science and Math II-A: Math, Stat, CompSci requirement

Mathematical concepts from linear algebra and n-dimensional Euclidean geometry, together with statistical concepts of estimation and hypothesis testing, are developed and used to construct a unifying theory for two classes of applied methods: analysis of variance and regression analysis. The theory is developed in three stages: least squares and orthogonal projections; moment assumptions and the Gauss-Markov theorem; and the normal distribution and F-tests.

(Mathematics 342f)

This course develops the ideas of probability simultaneously from experimental and theoretical perspectives. The laboratory provides a range of experiences that enhance and sharpen the theoretical approach and, moreover, allows us to observe regularities in complex phenomena and to conjecture theorems. Topics include: introductory experiments; axiomatic probability; random variables, expectation, and variance; discrete distributions; continuous distributions; stochastic processes; functions of random variables; estimation and hypothesis testing.

(Fall) What Is Performance? - *Not offered this year/term

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Critical Social Thought 100f-03)

What's the difference between acting and being, and how does the idea of "performance" structure this difference? How do we "perform" our own identities, and how do we interpret the performances of others? This seminar offers a basic introduction to performance studies, an exciting new discipline through which everyday life, ritual behaviors, and artistic practices are studied. Perspectives from the arts, humanities, and social sciences will be explored using both textual and performative approaches. This is a speaking-, reading-, and writing-intensive class that includes innovative individual and group exercises.

(Spring) What Is Performance?

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

First-year seminar (Writing-intensive; Critical Social Thought 100F-03)

What's the difference between acting and being, and how does the idea of "performance" structure this difference? How do we "perform" our own identities, and how do we interpret the performances of others? This seminar offers a basic introduction to performance studies, an exciting new discipline through which everyday life, ritual behaviors, and artistic practices are studied. Perspectives from the arts, humanities, and social sciences will be explored using both textual and performative approaches. This is a speaking-, reading-, and writing-intensive course that includes innovative individual and group exercises.

(Spring) Acting II

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets Humanities I-A requirement

A continuation of techniques developed in Acting I with a greater commitment to the culture of collaboration. Concentration is on scene work with realist playwrights, contemporary masters e.g. Churchill, Shepard, Wellman and Parks and with new work by contemporary playwrights. Actor training will involve the embodiment of physical behavior, the visceral use of language, and more intermediate composition work with Viewpoints to develop and refine awareness. Practical tools explored in class are intended to offer the student greater vocal, physical, and imaginative freedom and clarity, as well as text analysis skills.

(Spring) Topics in Theatre Studies: Latina Theatre and Performance

Credits/PE Units: 4; Requirements met: Meets multicultural requirement; meets Humanities I-A requirement

(Speaking-intensive; Latam287-03)

This course offers transnational approaches to the theory and political practice of performance in the Americas with a focus on work by Latinas in the United States and women in Latin America. We will interrogate the ways in which race, sexuality, class, gender, indigenous and diasporic identities inform the methodological and aesthetic mandates of an array of artists from across disciplines. Employing multiple modes of performance from theater, dance, performance art, ritual, visual art, and folkloric music, we will explore how these practices have functioned and continue to allow for politically subversive or resistant transformation.
